

GREAT BRITAIN
AND IRELAND

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

C. F. CLAY, MANAGER

London: 47, WHITEHALL ROAD

Edinburgh: 100, PRINCES STREET

New York G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

Bombay, Calcutta and Madras MACMILLAN AND CO. LTD.

Toronto J. M. DENT AND SONS LTD.

Tokyo THE MARUZEN-KABUSHIKI KAISHA

All rights reserved

GREAT BRITAIN
AND IRELAND

A HISTORY FOR LOWER FORMS

BY

JOHN E. MORRIS, D.LITT.

BEDFORD GRAMMAR SCHOOL

WITH 100 ILLUSTRATIONS AND PLANS

Cambridge:
at the University Press

1916

First Edition 1910
Reprinted 1911, 1912.
Second Edition, 1913.
Reprinted 1914, 1915, 1916

Ramakrishna Mission Library
Muthiganj, Allahabad.

Class No. 114

Rank No. MUE 215

Accession 15605

PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION

I wish to reply in a few words to a critic whose remarks appeared in an educational journal of repute. A school-master and a writer for schools must present to a class two sides of a question. In most books the royalists of the Civil War have hardly received fair play, and I felt it necessary to present certain arguments somewhat strongly. But it does not follow that Macaulay is a bête noire to me, whether as regards that period or as regards his attack on Marlborough. The young ought to have the case for Laud or Strafford or Marlborough put strongly before them as a matter of fair play. Another critic, who objected to my remarks on ship-money, I would refer to the Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, Third Series, Vol. iv.

If I have given considerable space to Domesday Book this was done with the deliberate wish to fix young minds on critical periods. The Roman occupation may have lasted 360 years and William's reign 21 years, but a writer must pay attention to the importance of certain events as influencing the generations to come, not to mere duration of time.

I would point out that as a teacher I have found that a class always gains benefit from the presentment of facts according to dates. How can the Confirmation of the Charters be understood if treated in a section of constitutional history, while Wallace's rising is described in a section some pages further on? Therefore my plan throughout has been to write according to years and not subjects. A class can easily be made to pick out of several chapters the events concerning Scotland or India or the American colonies, whereas reading a chapter devoted to one subject only it loses all sense of other events happening at the same time.

J. E. M.

BEDFORD GRAMMAR SCHOOL, 1913.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
CELTIC AND ROMAN BRITAIN	I
ANGLO-SAXONS AND DANES	13
THE NORMAN CONQUEST	29
WILLIAM I, 1066—1087	35
WILLIAM II, 1087—1100	62
HENRY I, 1100—1135	68
THE ANARCHY, 1135—1154	76
HENRY II, 1154—1189	79
RICHARD I, 1189—1199	87
JOHN, 1199—1216	93
HENRY III, 1216—1272	101
EDWARD I, 1272—1307	116
EDWARD II, 1307—1327	142
EDWARD III, 1327—1377	149
RICHARD II, 1377—1399	170
HENRY IV, 1399—1413	173
HENRY V, 1413—1422	176
HENRY VI, 1422—1461	181
EDWARD IV, 1461—1483	189
RICHARD III, 1483—1485 ✓	189
HENRY VII, 1485—1509	193
HENRY VIII, 1509—1547	198
EDWARD VI, 1547—1553	218
MARY, 1553—1558	223
ELIZABETH, 1558—1603	225
JAMES I, 1603—1625	246
CHARLES I, 1625—1649	254
THE CIVIL WAR	268
THE COMMONWEALTH	284
CHARLES II, 1660—1685	297
JAMES II, 1685—1688	317
WILLIAM III AND MARY, 1689—1694—1702	323
ANNE, 1702—1714	339
GEORGE I, 1714—1727	356
GEORGE II, 1727—1760	364
GEORGE III, 1760—1820	383
GEORGE IV, 1820—1830	442
WILLIAM IV, 1830—1837	450
VICTORIA, 1837—1901 . 1890	455
EDWARD VII, 1901—1910	474
INDEX	481

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
Stonehenge, Wiltshire Phot. Frith	3
Roman wall and moat, Rochester Phot. J. E. Morris	7
Roman amphitheatre near Dorchester Phot. Frith	8
Maiden Castle (British) near Dorchester, Dorset Phot. J. E. Morris	9
Erming Street in Hertfordshire. Phot. Homeland Association	10
Brixworth, Northants; Saxon Church with Roman tiles Phot. J. E. Morris	11
Saxon arch, Earl's Barton. Phot. J. E. Morris	19
Norman arch, Earl's Barton. Phot. J. E. Morris	19
"Island" of Athelney. Phot. J. E. Morris	20
White Horse at Edington, near Westbury, Wiltshire. Phot. Frith	21
Saxon Tower, Earl's Barton. Phot. J. E. Morris	24
Norman Towers, Ely. Phot. J. E. Morris	25
Part of the Bayeux tapestry	33
Facsimile extract from Domesday Book. Phot. J. E. Morris	40
Domesday Book lying open Phot. J. E. Morris	41
A mound castle; reign of William I. Phot. J. E. Morris	43
Open Fields and Balks at Clothall, Herts	45
Rochester Keep, reign of Henry I. Phot. J. E. Morris	53
The Tower of London Phot. Frith	55
St Alban's Abbey. Phot. J. E. Morris	57
Tewkesbury Abbey. Phot. Frith	59
Durham Cathedral. Phot. Frith	64
Tintern Abbey. Phot. Frith	72
Fountains Abbey, ground plan	73
Hospitaller and Templar	89
Crusader from Temple Church	90
Château Gaillard	91
Runnymede. Phot. Homeland Association	98
Dover Castle. Phot. Frith	102
Ely. Phot. Frith	106
Salisbury. Phot. Frith	112
Triforium in Angel Choir, Lincoln Cathedral Phot. Frith	113
Edwardian tower and gateway added to Chepstow Castle. Phot. Frith	122
Bulth Castle as rebuilt by Edward I. Phot. Rev. D. E. Owen	124
Conway Castle, built by Edward I. Phot. J. E. Morris	125
Armour as worn at the end of Edward I's reign	136
Crossbowman and Archer. From Viollet le Duc	137

	PAGE
Pevensey. inner castle of Henry II	138
Rye	140
Stirling from the North Phot J. E. Morris	144
Haldon Hill from Berwick Phot J. E. Morris	150
Berwick upon Tweed as re-fortified by Elizabeth	154
Sir Geoffrey Loutterell being armed	156
Fowey (Troy Town). Phot. Frith	159
Canterbury Pilgrims	167
Canterbury Cathedral. Phot Frith	169
Plate armour and "camail" for the throat	178
Complete plate armour, Wars of the Roses	179
King's College Chapel, Cambridge. Phot Frith	184
Magdalen College, Oxford Phot Frith	186
Long Melford Church, Suffolk. Phot. J. E. Morris	195
Christ Church, Oxford Phot. Frith	200
Hampton Court Phot. Frith	201
Ightham Moat, Kent. Phot. Frith	206
Camber Castle in Sussex, near Rye. Phot Homeland Assoc	209
"The Great Harry"	210
Type of costume during Henry VIII's reign	214
Elizabethan courtier	214
The Spanish Armada off Calais	238
Plymouth, Drake's Island, etc. from Mt Edgcumbe. Phot Frith	239
"The Sovereign of the Seas"	259
Prince Rupert, Cavalier.	270
An Exquisite, 1646	273
Pikeman and musketeer, 1645	274
Cromwell's Ironside Phot. E. G. Wood	276
Dutch and English ships in the Thames	304
Upnor Castle, Kent	306
George Monk. Phot. Emery Walker	307
Chatham. Phot. Frith	308
Rye House. Phot Homeland Association	315
Knole Park, Sevenoaks Phot. Frith	316
Sedgemoor. Phot H. Corder	318
John Churchill, Lord Duke of Marlborough. Phot. Emery Walker	340
Military Costume, temp. George II	367
Quebec	379
Boston Harbour with "Bunker's Hill"	391
London Bridge, 1757	399
Gordon Riots Phot. Valentine	400
Fall of the Bastille, 14 July 1789	407
A Martello Tower	420

	PAGE
Duke of Wellington Phot Emery Walker	437
Napoleon	438
Old Toll House, Reigate Hill Phot Frith	443
The Black Bull Inn, North Side of Holborn	444
The Rocket	445
Telford's Menai Suspension Bridge Phot Frith	446
Eddystone Lighthouse Phot Frith	447
Navarino. Phot. Dr Harvey Goldsmith	448
Election of M.P.'s for Westminster 1820	452
Queen Victoria Phot Emery Walker	456
Delhi, The Palace and Lahore Gate. Phot Frith	461
A group of Sepoys	467
Queen Victoria's Jubilee 1897. Phot Frith	473
The "Victory" leaving Portsmouth, 12 September 1805 Phot. Symonds	475
H.M.S. "Dreadnought." Phot. Symonds	477

MAPS AND PLANS

Roman and Saxon periods	5
England and Wales Norman and Plantagenet reigns	37
Scotland and North England	133
Map of Cinque Ports	139
Bannockburn	145
Battle of Halidon Hill, 1333	151
Battle of Crecy, August 26, 1346	157
Norman and Plantagenet possessions in France	163
England: Civil Wars	277
Ireland: Stuarts and George III	329
London and Westminster	331
Bavaria and the Black Forest	344
The Netherlands	347
American Colonies and Canada	393
West Indies	397
Aboukir Bay: 1789 and 1801	414
India of Clive and Hastings	417
Plan of the Battle of Trafalgar	422
Europe chiefly to illustrate Napoleon's conquests	425
The Peninsula	431
India in the 19th century	463
Palestine and Egypt	469
The Cape	471

PEDIGREES

	PAGE
1. Norman and Angevin dynasties	75
2 The royal family of Scotland	148
3. The House of Lancaster	175
4. The House of York	187
5 The Nevilles, family of the King-Maker	188
6 The House of Hapsburg, Austria and Spain	202
7. The House of Tudor	217
8 The Howards	245
9 Reigning houses in Europe, 17th and 18th centuries	301
10. Family of George III	455

CELTIC AND ROMAN BRITAIN

THE INVASIONS OF JULIUS CAESAR, 55 AND 54 B.C.

ROMAN CONQUEST BY CLAUDIUS, 43 A.D.

ROMAN ARMIES DEPART, 407.

Who were the Ancient Britons? The men who first inhabited our island we usually call Britons. But this is really not accurate. There were many races who came over here before the Christian era, and we ought to keep them apart.

Scientific men who have examined their places of burial, their skeletons, their weapons and domestic implements, give us information about them.

The earliest inhabitants were small men with dark skins and long narrow heads, and we call them Iberians. They were wild folk and lived by hunting. But they possessed two arts; they could make knives and rough hatchets of chipped flints, and picks of reindeer-horn; they could light fires and thus scare away wild beasts. The period when they lived is called The Stone Age, because they used stone for their weapons and implements.

Similar small dark men lived in other parts of Europe, and their descendants, the Basques, at the west end of the Pyrenees, speak to-day a peculiar language of their own. •

Then came across the sea, but we know not when, bigger and fairer tribes of men with broad round heads. Some of them spoke the Celtic language, and were kinsmen of the Gauls who invaded Italy and burnt Rome in B.C. 390. In fact they were part of a great many tribes who overran Hispania (Spain) and Gallia (France), to which they gave their name, as well as north Italy, which the Romans called Nearer Gaul. They pushed the Iberians further and further to the west, for they were better fighters and knew how to work in bronze, so that they used bronze spears.

Their period is The Bronze Age, but they also used stone and horn. Whether they or the Iberians constructed the numerous camps and hill-forts, and the mighty mysterious circles of huge stones such as Stonehenge, is difficult to decide. Stonehenge was probably designed as a temple-cemetery to honour the dead. The Maiden Castle near Dorchester is a wonderful earthwork, a city rather than a camp, with four deep ditches and lofty ramparts, 45 acres by inner measurement, 115 acres inside the outermost ditch.

Lastly came The Brythons, from whom we have the words Briton and Britain. They were cousins of the Gauls, but spoke a different dialect of the Celtic language. Probably they were the first to use iron weapons in this island.

The Gauls did not destroy the Iberians, nor the Britons destroy the Gauls. Each new set of invaders partly conquered and enslaved the men they found; the rest were driven westwards and northwards if they wished to remain free. The Gaelic language is spoken to-day in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and in Ireland; and the British language is spoken in Wales, and was spoken not so very long ago in Cornwall. Often in Wales in the same family some of the brothers may be fair and big-headed, and others dark and narrow-headed, which seems to show how Iberians and Gauls and Britons mixed with each other and married. In the few centuries just before the invasion of Julius Caesar they were no longer mere wild ignorant savages. They cut down forest trees with their axes of bronze or iron, and made settlements. They used coined money. They had a considerable trade with Europe in corn and minerals, and their tin and lead were prized by those great merchants of old days, the Phoenicians. A Greek traveller from Massilia (Marseilles) praised the richness of our island about 300 years before Christ.

Stonehenge. Wiltshire

Gradual Conquest by the Romans. The mighty city of Rome was gradually conquering the lands round the Mediterranean from 200 onwards, and in 63 B.C. Pompey the Great annexed Syria. To his rival, Julius Caesar, fell the task of annexing Gaul in B.C. 58, for the Romans ever had to conquer new lands so as to keep safe what they had last conquered. It was to frighten the Britons, and to prevent them from sending supplies and help to their kinsmen the Gauls, that Caesar made two descents upon Britain in B.C. 55 and 54. He started from Portus Itius, which is either Boulogne or some port near Boulogne, and he landed near Deal. But he remained only a short time each year. It was in the second invasion that he crossed the Thames and made a treaty with a chieftain named Cassivellaunus.

The first serious invasion was in A.D. 43 in the reign of the emperor Claudius, and the work of conquest by the Romans went on slowly but steadily. Camulodunum (Colchester) was the first Roman colony, being conveniently situated up a creek on the east coast. Some very fierce fighting took place along the river Severn, where the chieftain Caradoc, or Caratacus, resisted desperately. The Romans at last won a great victory, probably on the river Teme, a tributary of the Severn, where a sugar-loaf hill, still known as Caer Caradoc, commemorates the British hero; an encampment on the hill was strengthened by stone walls, but the steady Romans with their shields locked over their heads—this was the testudo or tortoise-formation, for the raised shields looked like a tortoise's shell—stormed the position. Regular troops with their cool courage and training and discipline must in the long run beat fierce half-trained hordes. The Roman short swords and short heavy javelins were as effective as modern bayonets and rifles against such foes.

Roman and Saxon periods

The Great Revolt of Boadicea. Very soon, in the year 60, when Nero was emperor, the tribe of the Iceni broke into revolt. They lived in the present counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. Their chief was the ever famous warrior queen Boadicea; the correct spelling is said to be Boudicca, and the meaning is Victoria! Roman deceit and cruelty caused the revolt, and the Iceni, in revenge, stormed Camulodunum, Verulamium (St Albans) and Londinium, and massacred the inhabitants. But at last the general, Suetonius Paulinus, concentrated his troops and fought a pitched battle. He made them a short sarcastic speech, so the Roman historian Tacitus tells us; "They should despise the yells of the barbarians; there were more women than men in the British ranks; in all battles a few good troops decide the day." And, sure enough, the Romans gained a tremendous victory.

The emperor Nero had been a mad tyrant; he had persecuted the early Christians, and put St Paul to death. When he died there was a terrible civil war in Italy, but at last a fine manly soldier became emperor; this was Vespasian, who, in his younger days, had himself fought in Britain, and afterwards against the Jews, and whose son Titus finally took Jerusalem. Vespasian chose to be legatus another fine soldier, Agricola, by whom the conquest of Britain was practically finished. The tribes of the west and north were subdued, and he even penetrated into Scotland and won a battle somewhere near Perth among the Grampians. But Vespasian's feeble son Domitian, jealous of his greatness, recalled him.

There was more war after Agricola's time, but not on a large scale. Hadrian, who came over in person A.D. 120 to survey the province, planned the great wall from the mouth of the Tyne to the Solway Firth. His object was to abstain from conquest further north, and by this impregnable line of fortifications to keep the more savage Caledonians out of the already conquered parts of Britain. Another emperor, Antoninus, did indeed construct a second wall between the Clyde and the Forth, but it was soon abandoned. Probably a yet later emperor rebuilt Hadrian's wall in stone, and much of this work still exists. It was seventy miles long, and was defended by at least 15,000 men who had camps and towers at intervals.

How Britain prospered under the Romans. Under Roman rule the ravages of war were soon re-

Roman wall and moat, Rochester paired. Fierce and often cruel as conquerors, the Romans were very good organizers and rulers when a province was once conquered. Their rule of empire was to break down resistance and then govern justly. Parcere subjectis et debellare superbis—Spare the vanquished, and crush the proud—says the poet Virgil. It is one of the errors of history to picture the Romans as nothing but ruthless tyrants. Except in Wales the Britons under Roman sway lost the art of fighting, but gained very much in the arts of peace and civilization. Villas and towns sprang up in every direction, and the ruins of these can still be seen. A villa was not a small suburban residence, but a great country house with its outbuildings accommodating large numbers of servants. A famous town and health-resort with valuable medicinal waters was Aquæ Sulis, now known as Bath. But the Britons were never as thoroughly Romanized as the Gauls. The French and Spanish languages no less than the modern Italian are derived from Latin, but here the Romans left behind them only a few names of places; the commonest is chester, from castra or camp; others are port or harbour, coln or colony. Winchester and Lancaster, Portchester and Lincoln, are instances.

Roman amphitheatre near Dorchester

No less than five legions were in Britain at one time or another. A legion was much bigger than our regiment, and was in itself a small army. Three remained permanently after the conquest; one at Lincoln, afterwards transferred to York; another at Chester; the third at Caerleon in South-east Wales, the Welsh pronunciation of Castra legionis. You will notice that two of the three were stationed just where the Britons of Wales in their mountain homes always remained most warlike. Hadrian's wall was garrisoned by other troops, not regular legions. The recruits were mostly drawn from distant parts of the Roman empire.

The commercial centre was Londinium. The wide mouth of the Thames was naturally the chief channel of trade between Britain and Europe, and London was the most suitable place for a trading city, because the tide reaches it, yet it is well inland, and the water is not deep enough to prevent a bridge from being built at low tide. From Londinium ran three great roads; Watling Street, which connects eastwards with Dover, and north-westwards with Chester; Erming Street, which runs straight to Lincoln, and thence to York; and the third, which has four branches, to Winchester, to Exeter, to Bath, and to Gloucester and Caerleon. Notice that Gloucester and Chester, like London, are well situated up tidal rivers, and the bridge in each case makes the town a centre for commerce and war. A network of cross-roads and branch-roads connected Colchester and Lincoln and York with Chester and Gloucester and Bath. The Roman engineers built their roads solid. Their object was to construct imperishable tracks for the soldiers first, and for traders in the second place. They chose high ground as much as possible, so as to avoid swamps and to let the soldiers see their enemy; you must remember that in those days the river valleys were much more full of water than now, and the forests also were very dense in the valleys. Now-a-days a railway engineer lays his line, wherever he can, round the foot of a hill; the Romans preferred to go up and down. A good instance is Shooter's Hill, eight miles from London Bridge, where the modern road goes straight up exactly where Watling Street went, but the railway curves round. The Romans were the best engineers that the world ever saw before the nineteenth century. Places with strat in them, such as Stratford and Streatley, indicate Roman roads or streets.

Maiden Castle (British) near Dorchester, Dorset

Erming Street in Hertfordshire

Christianity gradually spread in Britain in the 2nd century, and St Alban, said to have been put to death at Verulamium, is counted as the first martyr; in Saxon days an abbey was built in his memory on a hill a mile off, and round the abbey grew up a new town of St Albans. Under the emperor Constantius, York was made the capital of the empire of the west, second only to Rome, and from York his son Constantine set out to make himself master of Rome. He was the first Christian emperor, and enlarged and renamed the old city of Byzantium, in the extreme east of Europe, Constantinople, in 330.

Brixworth, Northants; Saxon church with arches of Roman tiles

The Roman Empire is broken up. Now we come to the decline, and soon to the fall, of the Roman empire. It was not so much pride, or wealth, or luxury, or laziness, that destroyed the empire, as rivalry and ceaseless civil war. At first sight it seems absurd that a ruler should be succeeded by his eldest son, who may be a bad or weak man; this is succession by primogeniture, or the law of the first-born. But a moment's thought will show you that a bad reign is better than a civil war between two or three good men, each of whom thinks himself the most fit to rule. Between A.D. 200 and 400 the death of nearly every Roman emperor was followed by war. The legions in Britain were ambitious to put their chosen leader on the throne, and the legions in Gaul or Spain, Macedonia or Syria, to put theirs. So the empire was rent by war, and various tribes from central and eastern Europe, the Goths who were Germans and Christians, and the Huns who were heathen savages, poured over the Rhine and Danube. Saxon fleets threatened the south and east coasts of Britain, so that a special officer was appointed on purpose to beat them off and named "the Count of the Saxon shore." At last in 407 the legions from Britain were taken over to Gaul by an adventurer who called himself Constantine, and they never returned. Britain had now to govern and to defend herself.

NOTE.—The Icknield Way is acknowledged to be a pre-Roman road. Along its course are very many funeral mounds and camps of the Stone and Bronze ages. At one end is Brandon, where hundreds of pits have been found where Stone Age men dug for their flints; at the other is Avebury, the site of a very old stone circle or temple. Probably the Way finally ran on to Stonehenge.

The Pilgrims' Way was also a pre-Roman track, leading from the coast through Canterbury and along the downs, and its name is due to its being used by the pilgrims visiting Becket's shrine after Henry II's reign.

ANGLO-SAXONS AND DANES .

HENGIST AND Horsa, 449, ALFRED THE GREAT, 871—901;
CANUTE, 1017—1035.

The coming of German Pirates. Roman Britain, left without a regular army, was soon attacked on two sides. The unconquered Gaels of Ireland and Scotland swarmed into the north, even over Hadrian's wall. By sea came German pirates from the low lands round the mouth of the Elbe and from south Denmark, who spoke a language called Low Dutch. Even before 407 the Romans had had to keep up a fleet to beat them off. According to the story, Vortigern, a British chief, invited over some Jutes to help him against the Scots from the north; they came in 449 under Hengist and Horsa, helped Vortigern, then turned against him and conquered for themselves. They founded the kingdom of Kent, and their capital was Canterbury.

We need not remember many dates and names. Just let us fix our minds on the one great fact that during about 400 years the newcomers transformed part of Britain, namely England and S.E. Scotland, into a German-speaking country. It is a very long period, as long as the period which separates us from Henry VIII and the Reformation. One great body of invaders were called Angles, another Saxons, from the Angles we are called English, and from both is made up the phrase Anglo-Saxon. But we ourselves are not Anglo-Saxons, we are descended from those Britons who survived, from Angles and Saxons, and also from the next batches of conquerors, the Danes and the Normans, not to mention the Flemings and French who have settled amongst us at various dates. Our English language is German in origin, but very many changes in it have been caused by Norman-French, by the Latin of the Church, and the later Latin of learned and scientific men.

Let us take the Anglo-Saxon conquest according to geography. The Jutes had created the kingdom of Kent. A second body of pirates created the kingdom of Sussex, that is, of the South Saxons. Similarly was formed a third kingdom, called Essex, by their cousins, the East Saxons. Further north settled the Angles, who called themselves the North and the South Folk, in Norfolk and Suffolk, which together made up East Anglia. The word king was their name for each chief, and it signifies the head of kinsmen. Under-kings were aldermen, that is to say "elder men," a word whose meaning has curiously changed. These little kingdoms did not extend into the interior. Sussex was cut off by a vast forest, and East Anglia by forests and fens; but the men of Kent and Essex, who might have penetrated up the Thames, were blocked by London for a time.

Some historians think that the West Saxons, who founded the kingdom of Wessex, conquered originally up the Thames valley, and thence spread into Berkshire and Hampshire. Others say that they entered Britain by the great inlet which faces the Isle of Wight, known to-day as Southampton Water, and that their original kingdom of Wessex was the present Hampshire, whence in the course of a century they passed into Berkshire, Dorset, and Wiltshire, struck the Thames and spread up and down its course. They had plenty of hard fighting, especially against a British chief who beat and checked them for a time at Mons Badonicus, Badbury Rings, in Dorset; this was the hero whom legend and poetry have celebrated as the mighty Christian king, Arthur, the glory of chivalry. We must suppose that the West Saxons won a great reputation as fighters, and that as fast as new bands arrived from Germany they preferred to attach themselves to these conquerors rather than to the smaller kingdoms of Kent and Essex. At last a king named Ceawlin avenged Badbury by a great victory at Deorham, near Bath, in 577. Wessex was now extended to the Avon and Severn, and cut the Britons of Wales apart from those of Cornwall. Ceawlin was hailed as Bretwalda, the "wielder" of Britain.

Let us here pause to notice that the West Saxons did not reach the Severn till 170 years after the departure of the Roman soldiers; this is a long period and shows how gradual was their advance. Also they did not always destroy with fire the Romano-British settlements, nor kill all the inhabitants. Silchester, for instance, was simply deserted and fell into ruin by slow decay, because the Saxons preferred to settle in villages rather than in towns.

Meanwhile the Angles penetrated into Britain from the Wash up the river Nen, and from the Humber up the Trent and the Ouse. They, too, must have received large reinforcements from their kinsfolk. They had constantly to fight the Britons, but finally they founded two big kingdoms, Northumbria between the Humber and the Forth, and Mercia in the midlands. But it was a very long time before the Northumbrians reached the western coast. Not till 613 did they conquer Chester. So, about that date, the Britons of south-west Scotland and Cumberland were cut off from the Britons of Wales by Chester, just as the spread of the West Saxons into Somerset cut off Wales from Cornwall.

The next thing that we see is that the Northumbrians fought against the Mercians, and the Mercians against the West Saxons; that is to say, the invaders, having thoroughly beaten the Britons, very naturally turned against each other.

The Conversion of England. Both Angles and Saxons came as heathens and persecutors. Christianity was re-introduced into England from two sides. The faith had never died out wholly amongst the Britons, and it was from the north that missionaries from Ireland and Scotland, such as St Colomba, spread into Northumbria, though very slowly. The chief religious settlement was on the little island of Lindisfarne off the coast of the present county of Northumberland. On the other side missionaries came to Kent from Rome. Pope Gregory the Great sent St Augustine, who landed in Kent in 597 and made Canterbury the southern centre of Christianity. For a long time the Mercians remained heathen, while the Angles of the north and the Jutes and Saxons of the south were being converted. But the faith gradually spread even in Mercia. In 664 a debate was held at Whitby, and it was finally decided that all the Christians of England should be in communion with the central Church of Rome. There came from Rome to be Archbishop of Canterbury a priest named Theodore, of Tarsus in Asia Minor, the home of the first great Christian preacher to the Gentiles, namely St Paul. Theodore reorganised the Church in England; though it was not till rather later that the bishopric of York became a second Archbishopric. But though Angles and Saxons now worshipped alike and formed one church, they were far from forming one nation.

Between about 600 and 700 the strongest of the kingdoms was that of Northumbria; between 700 and 800 it was Mercia. The strongest king of the Mercians was named Offa, who beat the Britons and constructed Offa's Dyke as a boundary between England and Wales. We must now call these Britons by the name of Welsh, which meant in the language of the conquerors "strangers." Offa also beat the West Saxons back to the Thames. At last about the year 830 Egbert won supremacy for Wessex, and in his turn over-ran Mercia up to the Humber.

The Coming of the Heathen Danes. In the eighth century a new and fierce enemy appeared. These were the Danes and Norwegians, otherwise called North-men. They came in their long light galleys, rowed into the bays and up the rivers, burnt and plundered, and spread terror far and wide. They were heathens and knew no mercy. At first they came simply and solely for plunder, and they harried the coasts not only of England, but of all western Europe, and even reached the Mediterranean. Some time after the death of Egbert parties of Danes began to settle instead of sailing away after their raids. Now the Angles and Saxons must have been much more numerous than the Danes, and yet they were in abject terror of them. This has to be explained.

The Anglo-Saxon village life. During the period of the Anglo-Saxon conquest and settlement, roughly between 450 and 850, the character of these tribes seems to undergo a change. Not only were they converted to Christianity, but also they gradually began to enjoy a peaceful life as farmers. Of course their peace was much interrupted by their wars against each other, but on the whole it may be truly said that farming became their chief occupation. As each piece of land was conquered from the Britons they settled down in villages with their families, and the names which they gave to these villages exist to the present day; places ending in ton, ham, hull, ford, etc., show where they set themselves to farm. A hide of land, about 120 acres, but by no means accurate acres of 4840 square yards, was the ordinary plot of each family. All the free landholders of the village farmed the land in common in three fields, of which two were ploughed each year and one was fallow by turns; sometimes in two fields, one ploughed and one fallow. The fields were divided into strips, a furlong or furrow-long in length. Say there are 100 strips and ten families in the village; all the men plough and reap in common, but A. gathers the corn from strips 1, 11, 21, etc., B. from strips 2, 12, 22, etc., and so on, so that no man's land lay in one patch. They had in return for their land certain duties to perform. They were all free warriors and had to defend their country, also they had to join at the king's command the national army, whether of Wessex or Mercia, East Anglia or Kent, which was called the fyrð. Secondly, they had to attend the mote or meeting of all the freemen; here justice was administered and fines were inflicted. When the Angles and Saxons were still heathens they used to have blood-feuds, and the kinsmen of a murdered man claimed the right to avenge his death. But in course of time a blood-fine, called werfeld, was substituted, so many shillings to be paid to the kin of a murdered man according to his rank. Also there was the Ordeal; a man accused of crime had to undergo a test by fire or red-hot iron or boiling water, the idea being that if he were innocent the Almighty would not allow him to suffer harm.

Of course as far back as even 450 there must have been some distinction between leader and led. Yet the warriors seemed to regard themselves as all free and all equal. Below them there must have been many slaves and semi-slaves, whether conquered Britons or degraded Saxons. The Britons were by no means exterminated, and, though mostly enslaved, they could rise in the scale of freedom. From various reasons therefore one can picture differences of class and rank creeping into the Anglo-Saxon society. As time went on, they grew to be more fond of farming than fighting. Many of the warriors lost their energy, and with it their freedom. The king always claimed large pieces of land in each part of his dominions, and had his own picked soldiers and companions. So naturally he preferred that these should do the fighting, while he made the farmers, who shirked their military duties, pay for those who did not shirk. It is this change from the fierce pirates and warriors of 450 to the land-loving farmers of 850 which enabled the Danes to conquer so easily. It also explains why the Danes seemed so wicked in their eyes; the descendants of the old pirates, now respectable land-owners, looked upon the new pirates as most unspeakable robbers.

When the Danes were tempted to conquer and stay on the conquered lands, we find them settling in the greatest numbers along the east coast, and in the north-east midlands. Here they introduced Danish customs, so that

Saxon arch, Earl's Barton

Norman arch, Earl's Barton

in 1086 when Domesday Book was drawn up the land was measured not by Saxon hides, but by Danish carucates, and the political divisions were wapentakes, from the assemblies in which the fierce Danes "touched" or clashed their "weapons." They did not like farming in common, but each Dane preferred his own little farmstead. To maintain their hold over the country they formed garrisons in central places, especially the five towns Lincoln, Stamford, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester. One of their bodies founded the kingdom of York, and another the kingdom of East Anglia. Elsewhere they did not settle so thickly, and the Saxon system of hides was not entirely done away with. They also sailed along the south coast and into the Bristol Channel, and even to Ireland, raiding in one place, conquering in another. Places

"Island" of Athelney

"The Island of the Princes." It would be a real island now if the river Tone were not embanked ending in by and wich or wick mark Danish settlements, such as Whitby, Ipswich, Berwick; by means "farm," and wich is a "creek." On the coast of Ireland we find Waterford and similar names, ford here meaning "fiord." But many Anglo-Saxon names remain in Danish districts, and of the five towns mentioned above two have Roman endings, two Saxon, and only one Danish.

Alfred the Great saves Wessex. The smaller Anglo-Saxon kingdoms were simply destroyed by these attacks of the Danes. Even the big kingdom of Mercia was broken up. It seemed as if Wessex was going to give way, and a great Danish land army penetrated across the Thames. Then a true hero arose to meet the danger. Alfred, rightly named the Great, fought in 871 nine fierce battles, but was gradually beaten out of Berkshire towards

White Horse at Edington, near Westbury, Wiltshire

Salisbury, and had to buy off his enemy. In 878 he was surprised by another attack and took refuge in the Isle of Athelney in the midst of the fens and swamps of Somerset; it is to this year that the story of the cakes belongs. The West Saxon host was collected, Alfred slipped out and met them, and beat Guthrum, the Danish chieftain,* in a great battle at Ethandun or Edington, where now the figure of a white horse is seen on the side of the green downs. Both Edington and Athelney are on a line of the Great Western Railway¹, by which express trains run from London to Exeter. Guthrum was driven not only out of Wessex but also out of western Mercia, and two treaties were arranged between him and Alfred; the more important one was in the year 885. A boundary was drawn between Saxon and Dane. The line was this the Thames up to the mouth of the Lea, the Lea up to its source near Luton, an artificial line from Luton to Bedford, the river Ouse up stream till it cuts Watling Street, and thence Watling Street itself to Chester. South and west of the line Alfred was to be king, so that London was thus restored to the Saxons; to the north and east, where Guthrum was still to be in power, the land was known as the Danelagh. Also Guthrum became a Christian.

The Northmen in France. Meanwhile the same sort of thing was going on in France. Northmen as fierce as the Danes rowed up the French rivers, pillaged and burnt, and introduced a similar reign of terror. In this very year 885 they besieged Paris, and were with the utmost difficulty beaten off. In 911 their chief, Hrolf or Rollo, was acknowledged as Duke of Normandy by the very feeble so-called King of France, and became a Christian. France was at this time split into very many duchies and counties, each governed and defended by its lord according to his power, and "King of France" was an empty title.

What Alfred did for England. It was now proved that the Saxons could fight as well as ever they did, provided that they were well led. We find the Royal Family of Wessex gained enormous power as the saviour of the race. For nearly two hundred years to come whenever the Saxons had a powerful king they could hold their own, but naturally the king was more important than the nation. Therefore we want to know something about the character of Alfred as the greatest figure in history between the departure of the Romans and the coming of the Normans. After all, the simple fact is that Alfred knew how to lead. He could inspire his captains and his men with a feeling of devotion; they would follow him, obey him, and die for him. In particular he was a great organizer; he was the very first king, since the time when the earliest Saxons came by sea, to turn his attention to defence by sea, to create a Saxon navy, although he had to man it at first with mercenaries from Holland. He thus saved the coasts of Wessex from raids. On land he organized his army by calling up the countrymen to serve in relays; while one batch was tilling the fields, another was to fight, and then the batches changed places. Next he devoted himself to the education of his people, translated and himself wrote books, and summoned learned clergy from all over Europe to come to England. He drew up a code of law and started the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. He seems to have considered ignorance to be a worse enemy than the Dane. His work was partly useless, and he was deeply grieved that it was so hard to find good and well educated priests. After him the Anglo-Saxon race appears to have fallen back again into rustic ignorance.

¹ Many an old campaign followed a line now marked by a railway. The reason is clear. An army follows the most convenient route along some valley or river, and an engineer surveying the ground for his railway chooses the same track for the same reasons. The G.W.R. goes from Reading up the valley of the Kennet past Newbury, then pulls up hill under the high downs past Edington, then down hill to Athelney.

A Century of Alfred's Descendants. After his death his son Edward the Elder, and his heroic daughter Ethelfleda who married the Alderman of the Mercians, set to work to reconquer the Danelagh across the dividing line. Here let us notice that Alfred and Edward made Mercia a district of Wessex, and there was never again a king of Mercia. Edward's son Athelstan continued the work, and also beat the Danes and their allies the Scots at Brunanburgh in the extreme north, near the Solway Firth¹. Other kings of the same family were able to govern more peacefully, such as Edgar the Peaceful of whom the story is told that he was rowed upon the river Dee by eight subject kings. The great minister at this date was Dunstan who came from the most important abbey of Wessex, namely Glastonbury in Somerset. Dunstan, like Alfred, devoted himself to the religious education of the people and to the improvement of their teachers, the monks and priests.

¹ Some historians say "at Boune in Lincolnshire," or "at Bromsborough in Cheshire."

Saxon Tower, Earl's Barton ; date perhaps 1050

As fast as Alfred and Edward and their successors reconquered Mercia and the Danelagh they divided the country into shires. The original kingdom of the West Saxons south of the Thames was already so divided. Now north of the Thames the name of each new shire was taken from its chief town. It is very likely that the Danes first made Huntingdon, for instance, a military centre with a permanent garrison, and Edward or Athelstan or Edgar made it the capital of a new shire where in case of another Danish invasion the Angles and Saxons could rally in self-defence. Such a town was fortified with a wall of earth, unless perhaps the old Roman stone walls were still good, and was called a burgh. It is curious that now-a-days we think of a borough as a town which sends a member to Parliament, not as a fortress. The Saxons never were good at building, yet the walls of these burghs were strong enough for their purpose. The old small kingdoms, Sussex, Kent, Essex and the others were now simply shires under the kings of Wessex. The name of Mercia disappears in course of time, and Northumbria shrivels up into Northumberland.

Norman Towers, Ely

The results of the rule of Wessex. These same kings must have spoken to the people whom they had saved from the Danes in some such way as this: "You allowed the Danes to conquer you because you had lost the art of fighting through your love of comfort and peaceful farming.

We, the kings of Wessex, have saved you from the Danes, and we demand a portion of your land as our reward. Over this we intend to place our trusty servants and soldiers, the thegns, who will be responsible for the defence of the country. You may call yourselves free Saxons and Angles, churls and boors, but you will have to regard the thegns as your leaders."

Thus during the centuries between Alfred and William the Conqueror we find the churls sinking ever lower and lower, nearer by degrees to actual serfdom. The churls' farm, and the thegns fight and carry on the government. Long before the arrival of William from Normandy, something like what we know as the Feudal System is being established here. There are still plenty of really free men, especially in the eastern shires. But the thegns get more and more power; they are the lords, "hlaforðs" or bread-distributors, and the king is their over-lord; they have under them their "men," their retainers and soldiers with whom they fight the king's battles, not at the head of the churls, but in place of the churls. They defend the burghs, and look after the roads and bridges.

There are now a variety of motes or assemblies, the mote of each village, the mote of each hundred or group of villages, the mote of each shire or group of hundreds, and finally the great assembly or Witenagemote. The aldermen and the king's thegns, the bishops and chief clergy, come to the meetings of the Witan or Wise Men. But the king is very strong, for it is he who gives unity to the nation. The thegns are the king's thegns, justice is the king's justice. "If I break your head, I break something which is much more important, namely the King's Peace."

Ethelred and the Great Collapse. At last even the House of Alfred was represented by a bad king, Ethelred the Unready of unhappy memory, Ethelred who always took bad advice and did the wrong thing. Once more the Danes came over the sea. And now it was not bands of pirates fighting for themselves to win new lands, but the king of Denmark himself who wished to subject England to his own country. First Ethelred was foolish enough to buy the Danes off. He levied a tax of two shillings upon every hide of land, and this was called danegeld, that is gold for the Danes. Of course the Danes took it and then came again. In 1002 he married, as his second wife, Emma the daughter of Duke Richard of Normandy, an event of enormous importance in our history, as though he were looking for help to the Northmen, who had now been established in France for nearly a century. Then he did something both silly and wicked. He organized the same year a horrible massacre of the Danish inhabitants on St Brice's day, which goes by the name of the massacre of St Brice. King Sweyn of Denmark avenged his countrymen by a terribly cruel conquest. A treacherous knave, Eadric Streona, who held the rank of alderman, did much harm by changing sides several times.

¹ Great would have been their surprise if they could have foreseen that the words "churl" and "boor" would come to mean "rough-mannered and ignorant fellows."

In the course of the war Sweyn died and was succeeded by his son Canute, and Ethelred by his son Edmund Ironside. The two new kings were great fighters, and Edmund seemed to be likely by his pluck and skill to make up for the harm done by his unready father. Eadric at first supported him, and then once more played the traitor. Edmund lost a great battle, made a treaty with Canute, and mysteriously died; everybody suspected that he was murdered.

Canute joins England to Denmark. Canute was now undisputed king of England and Denmark and Norway (1017 to 1035). He was quite young, and was at first cruel and unscrupulous. It is said that "he had waded through blood to the throne." Suddenly he became a reformed character, was baptized, made a pilgrimage to Rome, and governed very justly. He made two chief changes in England. He formed a big bodyguard, almost a small permanent army, of housecarls, armed with the great Danish battle-axe, and paid by regular levies of danegeld; thus this land-tax, levied by Ethelred to bribe the Danes, became a permanent tax to keep up the Danish guards. Secondly, he divided England into several great divisions, Wessex, Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumbria, over which he set jarls. The Danish word jarl meant "captain," and it was now used instead of alderman to denote the ruler of one of the new big divisions. The Saxons pronounced it earl, and for the first time in our history we find earls as the greatest lords of the country next to the king. The most celebrated of the new earls was Godwin, who married Canute's cousin Gytha and was very loyal to him. Canute himself married Ethelred's widow, the Norman Emma. England was now merely one province of a great Danish empire.

On the death of Canute there was some trouble caused by his worthless sons, but in 1042 the son of Ethelred and Emma, who had been living in Normandy, was invited to England. This was Edward the Confessor.

THE NORMAN CONQUEST

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, 1042—1066.

King Edward and Earl Godwin. The country required a strong ruler, but Edward the Confessor was weak and unable to lead. Let him first have the praise that he merits; he founded the West Minster two miles to the west of London, though the present abbey which we all know so well was built by Henry III and his successors. But he was son of the Norman Emma and had been brought up in Normandy, consequently he introduced Norman favourites, and even appointed a Norman to be archbishop. He could not control the great earls whom Canute had created, Godwin of Wessex and Leofric of Mercia. The weakness of the King and the jealousies which existed between the lords, at a time when unity alone could save the country from invasion, gave an opportunity to William.

Godwin was a sincere patriot, but he was over-bearing and grasping. He was devoted to Wessex, and how could Leofric and Siward, or indeed any Mercian or Northumbrian, work well with him? Once he went into exile, but, coming back with his son Harold, he turned out the Norman archbishop, and Stigand was appointed. But unluckily this offended all devout churchmen, for there were rival popes at the time, and it was the unsuccessful "anti-pope" who sanctioned Stigand's appointment. Godwin's daughter Edith was already married to Edward. Harold was made Earl of East Anglia.

The Story of Harold Godwinson. On Godwin's death in 1053 Harold was obviously aiming at the crown. He made a new arrangement of the great earldoms. He himself took Wessex; East Anglia he gave to his brother Gurth, Northumbria to his brother Tostig. Leofric's grandson Edwin was allowed to retain Mercia. Waltheof, Siward's son, excluded from Northumbria, was given a new small earldom of Huntingdon. But the Northumbrians were an independent race, and objected to Tostig; so they turned him out, and made Morcar, Leofric's other grandson, their earl. Harold was not strong enough to dispute their choice.

During a pleasure cruise Harold was blown across to Normandy, fell into Duke William's power, and was not released till he swore on the bones of the most revered saints that he would support William's claim to the throne of England. Edward died; and Harold instantly seized the throne: none but his own partisans can have been present at the meeting of the Witan which nominally elected him King. He seized the throne rather than was chosen King. Edgar the Atheling, grandson of Edmund Ironside, was passed over. It was a bad omen for Harold's success that Stigand was still archbishop.

The Army of Harold of Wessex. Harold was not an "Englishman" in the modern sense of the word; we "Englishmen" are descended from both the conquerors and the conquered of Hastings. Harold was a Saxon, yet not of the blood royal of Alfred, and no one knew Godwin's ancestry; his mother was of blood royal, but Danish. His best troops, his standing army of house-carls, were a body originally raised by the Dane Canute; they were armed with great Danish battle-axes; a chronicle definitely tells us that he sent to Denmark for recruits. Thus it would seem that some at least of the soldiers, perhaps even the majority of them, were not heroic Saxons devoted to their Saxon King, but only Danish mercenaries. Besides the house-carls Harold could rely on his loyal brothers Gurth and Leofwin, and on the thegns. But the worst of a military aristocracy such as that of the earls and thegns is just this; they served in place of, not at the head of, the national force of the country; when once they were beaten, there was no reserve left to take their place. Mere shire levies were an unwarlike rabble. Would Edwin and Morcar help Harold? He had allowed Morcar to take his own brother Tostig's earldom; he had married their sister so as to win them over. As far as we can judge, they seem to have done their best in the coming war. Meanwhile Tostig made alliance with Harold Hardrada of Norway, and was planning an invasion so as to win back Northumbria.

Duke William and his Army. Neither was William a "Frenchman" though he came from France. He had of course no right at all to the throne, even if the Confessor had named him his heir. But he was a masterful ruler. He had held his own in Normandy since his boyhood by sheer determination. The Normans were a turbulent and restless race, who retained all the piratical instincts of their Norwegian forefathers. Probably they had not intermarried much with the French during the 150 years they had been in Normandy since the settlement of Rollo; even to-day the peasant of Normandy is of a Scandinavian type, tall, fair-haired, blue-eyed, not at all like his French neighbours. They spoke French, however, and had adopted some French ideas. They refused to invade England as William's vassals, but simply took up arms as adventurers on condition that he would give them lands after the conquest. Other adventurers volunteered, from Flanders, Boulogne, Brittany, on the same terms. The flower of the army were horsemen, and wore mail shirts and open helmets; the foot included short-bow archers and spearmen. The religious sentiment of the age was in favour of the duke; Harold was a perjured man, and was supported by the usurper Stigand; so Pope Alexander sent a consecrated banner to the Norman army. As the invader. William could afford to play a waiting game as long as the wind was unfavourable, and could cross when he chose; Harold was distracted by news that Tostig and Harold Hardrada of Norway were coming.

Two invasions to be faced. We must look at the dates carefully. Harold had had eight months for preparation, and must have laid his plans to resist both sets of enemies, but he knew not which to expect first. On September 8 he was forced to disband many of his southern levies for lack of provisions. The Norwegians, after all, landed first. Edwin and Morcar did their duty but were beaten near York, on September 20. Harold pushed north with the house-carls, and with such other troops that he still had or levied on the way; he offered to give back Northumbria to Tostig, but to Hardrada "only seven foot's room, or so much more as he may need, seeing that he is taller than other men." On September 25 he beat and slew them both at Stamford Bridge, eight miles east of York, on the Derwent. Two days later William sailed, and landed the next day at Pevensey. On October 13 Harold was posted on a ridge eight miles inland from Hastings. He had had a bare fortnight in which to march from Yorkshire to Sussex, and to raise reinforcements en route. Edwin and Morcar cannot be blamed, for they had had no time to rally their shattered forces.

The Battle of Hastings, October 14. When two armies of equal bravery meet, victory will go to the side which can best manœuvre and combine different methods of attack. Harold on a front of 600 yards put into line, at an estimate of ten ranks, some 6,000 men, of which perhaps 4,000 were house-carls or thegns and their retainers of good fighting material. They were all on foot and formed a shield-wall, shoulder to shoulder; therefore they were condemned to stand on the defensive for fear of breaking their ranks. William had perhaps 3,000 horse and 6,000 foot;—remember that he had landed his whole army in one day, and for an army of even that size with horses and baggage very many transports would be wanted. First he sent up the slope his archers, then his foot spearmen, lastly his horsemen. The axe-men easily beat them off. But the tug of war comes when charge succeeds charge, and when a counter-charge is dangerous. The Bretons on William's left broke, and some of Harold's men pursued; promptly William destroyed the pursuers by turning on them the cavalry of his centre. Then he planned the shaft retreat of his right wing with the same results. Finally, with alternate volleys of arrows and rushes of horse, he broke even the house-carls. When Harold was killed by an arrow in his eye all was over. So mobility and combination triumphed, but only after hours of hard fighting.

Part of the Bayeux tapestry; William is shown in the middle of the top line

As for disputed points; firstly, a poet-chronicler tells us that Harold erected a real wall of wood in front of his line; but he lived many years after the battle, and probably misunderstood the meaning of "shield-wall." The Bayeux tapestry shows no palisade. This famous work of art was made by Norman ladies in honour of Odo, the warrior-bishop of Bayeux, William's half-brother, and gives the whole story of Harold's voyage and captivity and oath as well as of the battle. As to the name: ought it to be the Battle of Senlac? One answers by another question: why give to a nameless uninhabited ridge in England a French name coined in later years? The battle of Waterloo was fought three miles from the village of Waterloo, so let us keep to the popular name of Hastings, the inhabited place nearest to the scene of Harold's defeat.

WILLIAM I, 1066—1087

THE GREAT SURVEY FOR DOMESDAY BOOK, 1086.

Harold, Gurth, and Leofwin were all dead, and England had no leader. William moved on Dover, then along Watling Street towards London, yet did not cross the Thames till he reached Wallingford, probably he made this detour so as to cut off Winchester from London. Now he received the submission of Stigand, and next of the Londoners. His track can be traced by the entries in Domesday Book, which record the damage done between Hastings and Berkhamsted, not wanton destruction, but damage due to the slaughter of animals and seizure of seed-corn to feed the Norman soldiers. He went through the form of being elected king by the surviving members of the Witan, and was crowned at Westminster by the Archbishop of York on Christmas day.

The last risings of Anglo-Saxons. There was yet a certain amount of resistance to be put down. But Edwin and Morcar had not the gift of leadership, and Waltheof submitted and married William's niece Judith. Devon and Mercia were easily conquered. The Danes naturally made an effort to secure a country which they had so often raided, and where so many of their kin still lived; William in reply in 1069 laid Yorkshire waste from end to end, so that they might have no base there for any future invasion. The most promising effort was in The Isle of Ely among the fens, where Hereward held out manfully till 1071. He was a "man" of the Abbot of Peterborough, and has lived in romance as a popular Anglian hero. Edgar the Atheling fled to Malcolm of Scotland, who had married his sister Margaret, and afterwards to the Continent.

First rising of Norman Barons. Very soon it was seen that William would have as his worst enemies, neither Saxons nor Danes, but his own Normans. They had fought for him at Hastings to win lands in England; he gave them the lands, but let them understand clearly that he did not mean them to govern them as they wished. The Earls of Norfolk and Hereford were the first to defy him, and persuaded Waltheof to join them. They were easily crushed, but only Waltheof was executed. The Saxons regarded him as a martyr; the story ran that he had at once submitted to William, but that his wife Judith stirred her uncle against him.

Odo of Bayeux, warrior much more than bishop, was made Earl of Kent, and also deputy for William when William went home to Normandy. He was ambitious, and dared to raise troops in his own name in England for an expedition abroad. William arrested him, not as bishop, but as earl, and imprisoned him for the rest of the reign.

He also had trouble from his own son Robert, who was supported by Philip I of France. Once at Gerberoi in Normandy he was even unhorsed by Robert, and saved by Tokig the son of a loyal Saxon thegn.

The old acres and new masters. Domesday Book has a fascination for every keen lover of history and of England. The very words suggest romance. Here we have the record of the greatest event in our national life, of the crisis when England changed masters and thereby the foundations of the England of to-day were laid, the story of the turning-out of the Anglo-Saxon thegns and the redistribution of the lands among the adventurous newcomers from Normandy. Not another nation has such a land-register with such wealth of details. Pyramids and temples may be thousands of years older, but tell only of dead and gone creeds and empires. Domesday Book is 820 years old, yet tells us of our own towns and villages, many of them grown and altered beyond recognition, many still quite small and recalling old conditions, but all connected by a continuous history with the Conquest and the Saxon life beyond it. You can still see in the country many a mound-and-court castle, many a parish church with some Saxon or Norman work, and at once Domesday Book is brought to mind. Any one must be strangely dull if he fails to understand the romance of such a church as that at Earl's Barton, in Northants, where bells still ring for worship from a Saxon tower, and the choir sing from Norman stalls. In other villages you may see a 14th or 15th century church, a manor-house, a mill or dove-cot, on the exact site of the older building, and a few of the old stones may be worked into the new. These humble villages speak to us of the days of the Conquest more eloquently than even the mighty castles and cathedrals, because they illustrate the national rustic life.

England and Wales. Norman and Plantagenet reigns

Domesday Book was compiled after a survey had been made in 1086 by the Conqueror's order. He wanted to know exactly who held each piece of land, whether the Norman or other foreigner to whom he had given it, or the man to whom it was sub-let, or the Saxon or Danish freeholder who perhaps still kept it; also how much danegeld he had the right to receive when he taxed the country for war. The surveyors recorded, county by county, the number of hides and acres, the corn lands and meadows; they gave the number of the male population of the villages, of the plough-teams at eight oxen to the team, of the pigs in the wood-land, and sometimes of the milch-kine and sheep; and lastly the value of the land at three dates, firstly "now," secondly at the time of allotment by William, and thirdly when King Edward reigned, T.R.E., tempore regis Edwardi,—the Confessor, it should be noticed, not Harold, who was a usurper in Norman eyes. The register for Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex is bound up in a separate volume, known as the "little" Domesday. Of the six northern counties Yorkshire was mostly waste; Lancashire was not yet a county; Durham and Northumberland were independent under their Bishop; Cumberland and Westmorland, held by the Scots, were not registered.

In each county is first recorded the royal land. William took for himself whatever the Saxon kings had held. He thus drew a large private income, and had places where he might stay when he made a royal progress through England. We read that there were 20 hides at Windsor, worth £15 both "now" and T.R.E. About half he sub-let; on the other half were 22 villeins and two bordars, who worked one plough-team for his benefit and ten teams for their own; there was one slave, a fish-pond worth 6s. 8d., forty acres of meadow, wood-land for 50 pigs, &c.

Next we read the record of church-lands. "The Abbot of Peterborough holds the township of Peterborough. There are 8 hides, and enough land for 16 plough-teams, on the demesne are 5 teams, and 37 villeins and 8 bordars have eleven teams."

Then come the lands of the earls, the greater barons, the smaller barons, the poorer freeholders, down to the humblest man, provided that he holds his land directly from the king. Richard fitz Gilbert was a great baron and a cousin of William. He received 170 manors, and the head of his barony was at Clare in Suffolk; his descendants were Earls of Clare, and in time obtained the great Earldom of Gloucester. Eustace, Count of Boulogne, the most conspicuous of the non-Norman adventurers who fought at Hastings, received about 400 hides in all, mostly scattered throughout Essex, but some in Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambs., Hunts, Beds., Herts., Kent, Surrey, Oxon., Somerset.

As a typical baron of medium importance we will take Walter the Fleming; his descendants can to-day trace their pedigree to him without a break, and this is an exceedingly rare thing. William gave to his family some 115 hides in all, which a Saxon thegn named Leofnoth used to hold, mostly in Beds. and Northants. "At Odell Walter holds of the King $5\frac{5}{12}$ hides; there are 5 plough-teams, two hides in the demesne and two teams thereon, and 13 villeins with three teams: there are 5 bordars, 5 slaves, a mill worth

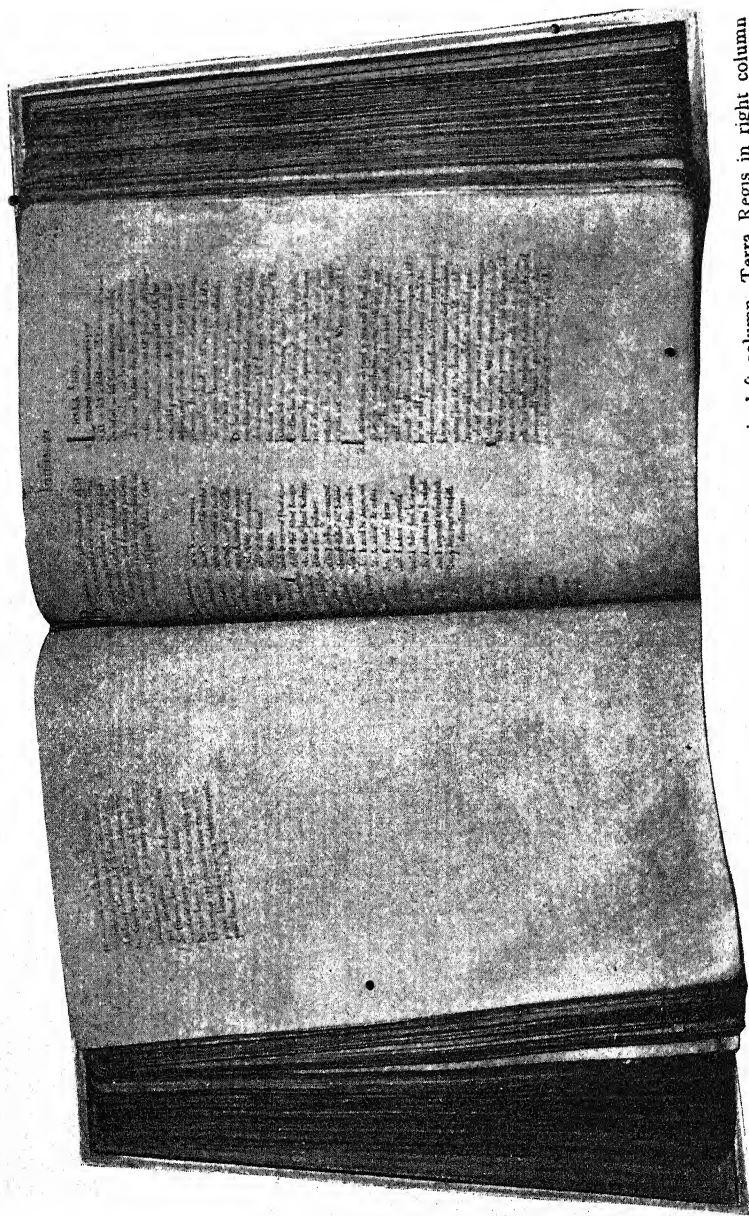

36s. 8d., meadow, wood-land for 60 pigs. Value now £5., when allotted £8, T.R.E £10. This manor King Edward's de hund testant.

TERRA WALTERI FLANDRENSIS in hunc modum
 Walterus flandrensis 7 filius deo conforat
 p. x. h. se desit x. 8. Sed postq. p. u. uenit in anglia nise desit n. p. x. h. 7 hoc qui. u. h. u.
 tenuit 7 tenens omi elucandem p. 7 q. b. p. a.
 nuq. 7 reanere tra e. x. car. in dno. u. car. p. x. u.
 u. h. u. u. u. car. 7 alio. u. u. p. o. s. f. u. i. n. l. b. u. b. o. r. d.
 7 u. u. s. e. r. u. i. i. n. u. i. m. o. l. i. n. d. e. x. s. o. l. 7 u. u. i. d. e. n. p. r. i.
 u. u. car. Silua e. l. p. o. r. o. i. n. t. o. u. u. i. l. b. x. d. o.
 r. e. c. e. p. x. l. b. T. h. E. x. u. l. b. h. o. c. a. r. e. n. u. e. l. e. u. o. r. e.
 r. e. a. g. n. r. e. g. l. E. 7 a. u. i. u. o. l. u. e. u. e. n. d. e. p. o. r. o. u. e.
 In m. d. e. n. o. n. e. t. e. n. b. u. n. a. l. d. d. e. W. l. t. e. p. o. r. o. u. e.
 u. h. o. 7 p. a. e. u. i. n. d. n. o. e. i. c. a. r. 7 u. u. i. l. l. e. h. u. e.
 u. car. 7 alia. p. o. r. o. s. f. u. i. n. l. b. i. b. o. r. d. p. r. i. u. c. a. r.
 V. l. x. s. o. l. 7 o. n. d. q. d. o. r. e. c. e. p. T. h. E. x. u. s. o. l. h. a. n. c.
 7 r. e. n. u. e. u. i. s. o. d. i. h. o. e. s. b. r. u. c. q. 7 a. u. i. u. o. l. u. e. u. e. n. d. e. p. o. r. o. u. e.
 In l. o. r. n. e. t. e. n. b. u. g. o. d. e. W. l. t. e. p. o. r. o. u. e. s. e. r. u. i. t. e. n. o. n. d.
 i. h. o. 7 t. r. a. e. u. i. n. d. n. o. u. n. a. e. 7 u. u. i. b. o. r. d. u. i.
 s. e. r. u. i. u. i. c. a. r. p. r. i. u. c. a. r. Silua. x. d. p. o. r. o. V. l. x. x. o. o.
 s. o. l. x. d. o. r. e. c. e. p. x. s. o. l. T. h. E. x. u. s. o. l. h. a. n. c. q. a. m.
 r. e. n. u. e. l. e. u. o. r. e. r. e. a. g. n. h. u. e. 7 a. u. i. u. o. l. u. e. u. e. n. d. e. p. o. r. o. u. e.
 In W. a. d. e. h. e. l. l. e. t. e. n. W. l. t. e. p. o. r. o. u. e. s. e. r. u. i. t. e. n. o. n. d.
 7 u. n. a. u. i. n. g. 7 u. p. a. r. t. e. s. u. i. u. i. n. g. 7 p. a. e. u. i. n. d. n. o. u. n. a. e.
 u. h. o. g. 7 u. i. l. l. e. u. e. u. i. c. a. r. 7 r. e. u. i. u. i. l. l. e. u. i. c. a. r. l. b. i.
 u. b. o. r. d. 7 u. s. e. r. u. i. 7 i. m. o. l. i. n. d. e. x. o. o. u. i. s. o. l. 7 u. u. i. d. e. n.
 7 c. c. a. n. q. u. i. l. l. p. r. i. u. c. a. r. Silua. l. b. o. p. o. r. o. V. l. x. c. s. o. l.
 x. d. o. r. e. c. e. p. u. u. i. l. b. T. h. E. x. u. l. b. h. o. c. a. r. e. n. u. e. l. e. u. o. r. e.
 n. u. e. r. e. a. g. n. a. E. 7 p. o. r. o. u. e. s. o. d. i. d. i. m. i. h. o. h. a. b. u. e. q. p. o.
 u. e. d. i. s. t. e. a. u. i. u. o. l. u. e.
 In P. o. d. i. n. g. t. o. n. e. t. e. n. b. u. g. o. d. e. W. l. t. e. p. o. r. o. u. e. i. h. o. 7 u. u. i. u. i. n. g.
 t. r. a. e. u. i. c. a. r. 7 d. i. m. i. n. d. n. o. s. u. i. n. u. c. a. r. 7 u. u. i. u. i. l. l. e.
 h. u. e. u. i. c. a. r. 7 d. i. m. i. l. b. i. x. e. b. o. r. d. 7 u. i. s. e. r. u. i. p. r. i. u. c. a.
 Silua. x. p. o. r. o. V. l. x. u. i. l. b. 7 x. s. o. l. x. d. o. r. e. c. e. p. l. i.

Land of Walter the Fleming in the villages of Totternhoe,
 Milton Turvey, Wadehelle, and Podington

The second entry from the bottom reads: "In Wadehelle (Odell) tenet Walterus Flandrensis de rege v. hidas et unam virgatum et duas partes unius virgate. Terra est v. carucarum. In dominio duæ hidæ, et ibi sunt ii carucæ, et xiii villani cum iii carucis, &c."

thegn Leofnoth held, and one sokeman had half a hide of it freely." To complete the picture we add that another

Domesday Book lying open at the first page of Bedfordshire; list of landowners in left column, Terra Regis in right column

baron held $4\frac{1}{2}$ hides; therefore there were two manors and ten hides of land at Odell. Often enough the whole village is one manor under one lord, but not always and not here.

Now for a sub-tenant. "At Thurleigh Hugh holds of Walter the Fleming a manor of three hides, and Walter holds of the King. There are 7 plough-teams, two on the demesne, and 8 villeins have five; there are 12 bordars and 3 slaves, wood-land for 50 pigs. Value now £5, when allotted £3, T.R.E. £4. This manor King Edward's thegn Leofnoth held." In this village five other men held smaller pieces of land, and the total was five hides.

Let us reconstruct the story of this corner of England. In 1066 Leofnoth, a great man and loyal, raises his fighting force and goes off to serve Harold, perhaps both at Stamford and at Hastings. But the bulk of the churls and boors are left behind, for they are not trained soldiers. Rumours arrive of battles, for our villages are not far from the old Roman road between London and York. Later a portion of the Norman army passes this way on its march to Berkhamsted. At last appears a certain Fleming with his foreign mounted retainers. He informs the rustics that he is now their lord and that they must farm for him just as they had done for Leofnoth. He thinks that they look glum and sulky, and first he sets them to dig a deep oval ditch and throw up the earth inside to form a mound; a wooden palisade is run up, and a horse-shoe court with earth ramparts is added. Thus the Fleming and his foreigners can sleep safe at nights. He uses strange new words. He calls the land a manor, and himself the lord of the manor; his twenty manors in two counties are his barony, and Odell he makes the head of the barony. The churls he renames villeins, villagers; little does he think that centuries later Sam Weller, in ignorance of what the word once meant, will call poor greengrocer Harris "a desp'rate willin." The inferior boors are bordars, a term which has disappeared. These peasants find that they are only a little nearer to serfdom than under Leofnoth. They have to put in so many days of unpaid compulsory labour every year on their lord's demesne land. They may not leave the manor, they have to grind their corn at his mill, they must pay certain dues; in Guernsey, where Norman customs have lasted, a small tax called "poulage" is still paid, evidently a relic of old days when a lord demanded so many hens from the men of his manor. They have to appear at his manor-court, where he or his steward will settle their disputes and judge them for crimes and offences. They have to pay danegeld, when William imposes it from time to time, at 6s. on each hide; notice that the sum is three times greater than Ethelred's original danegeld. A hide now simply means a unit of land for paying this tax. Therefore £3 has to be collected from all the ten hides of Odell, and £1. 10s. from the five of Thurleigh. When the Fleming dies, his son Walter succeeds to the barony, and a younger son Hugh takes Thurleigh as under-tenant. In 1086 the king's surveyors come round, ask questions and write down the answers, spelling the names as best they can. And the result is that we can to-day read about these villages in the copy of Domesday Book now lying at the Record Office in London. One of Walter's descendants later on gets leave to build a stone castle on his mound at Odell, where to-day is a country-house overhanging the river Ouse. One of Hugh's descendants rebuilds the church at Thurleigh in late Norman style, and the belfry of it still stands; but here the mound had no stone work added to it. The family name of "Fleming" is dropped; the elder branch is "of Odell," and the younger branch slurring the first syllable call themselves Leighs or Lees.

A mound castle; reign of William I

The Peasants' lot under Norman rule. But the most important thing has yet to be explained. We have had the word demesne, dominium, lordship. It is used in two senses. Firstly, all land is held in demesne if it is not sub-let, as at Odell. Secondly, the portion of land farmed for the tenant or sub-tenant by the villeins and bordars without pay is in demesne, at Odell and Thurleigh, at Windsor and Peterborough, and everywhere else. Look again at the figures.

	Plough-teams		No. of Villeins	No. of Bordars	Value in 1066	Value when given	Value in 1086
	Dem.	Vill
Windsor	1	10	22	2	£15	£7½	£15
Peterborough	5	11	37	8	£1		£10
Odell	2	3	13	5	£10	£8	£5
Thurleigh	2	5	8	12	£4	£3	£5

Just think what these figures mean. The rustics at Windsor, whether the superior villeins or the inferior bordars, have only to work one-eleventh of their time upon the king's land without pay, ten-elevenths of their time and ten-elevenths of the furlong strips are their own, such serfdom cannot be very onerous. The 45 rustics of the monks of Peterborough are not quite so well off, but eleven-sixteenths of the strips are theirs. Those of Odell farm two-fifths for Walter, and three-fifths for themselves; notice how the value has diminished. At Thurleigh we may guess that the eight villeins have half a team each, and the dozen bordars one team between them; they are very well off, and farm two-sevenths for Hugh, and five-sevenths for themselves; the value of the land has risen. Evidently Hugh is a good resident lord, and his rustics are prosperous under him.

Open Fields and Balks at Clothall, Herts.

“A time there was ere England’s griefs began
When every rood of ground maintained its man”

Surely we can say that the Conquest has not done much harm. As long as the men can work their own strips and garner the corn for their own use, they can afford to put in some time on their lord’s demesne strips without grumbling. They were probably just as much serfs in reality under Leofnoth and the other thegns. We can thus understand why they do not rebel against William. It is not cowardice, but a considerable degree of prosperity and comfort while they can still hold their beloved strips of ground, that makes them put up with their foreign lords. West Saxon king, Danish king, Norman king, what matters it to them who governs England, if they can farm in peace? They have to pay heavy danegeld, but it is only collected at intervals. They have to attend their lord’s manor-court, but they are protected by the custom of the manor. Doubtless many a lord plays the petty tyrant when he can; yet it would not pay him to tyrannize so badly that the villeins cannot work well for him. Moreover it is to the king’s advantage that the baronage should not be tyrannical. There is the king’s officer in every county, the sheriff, just as in Saxon days; notice how this Saxon name has lived, though of course every sheriff is now a Norman. There is still the shire-mote, or the county court.

Of course many years must yet go by before things settle down. The Anglo-Saxon population is despised by the Normans. If a corpse is discovered, the whole neighbourhood will be punished unless it can be proved to be the corpse of an Anglo-Saxon, this is the custom of proving "Englishry," and is obviously invented to prevent the sudden murder of Normans. But the Conqueror is just, even if strict. "Stark he was to men that withstood him. So harsh and cruel was he that none dared resist his will. But the good peace he made in the land, so that a man might fare over his realm with a bosom full of gold." In fact William governed. Such a government had not been seen here except in the palmiest days of the House of Alfred, or under Canute for a short time. Henry II a century later will finish his work. Judges will come round in the king's name, and will claim their right to try villeins for serious offences and take them out of the manor-court. Only such royal judges will have the power of gallows. When a villein may not be hanged except in the king's name, the peasantry will have little to complain of beyond certain compulsory work and certain trifling payments to the lord of the manor. Under the Edwards villeinage will begin to die out in spite of much bitter effort of the lords to re-impose it; by the time of the Wars of the Roses it will be practically dead.

Here let us picture the scene at a manor-court in Henry II's reign. In a neighbouring village in the same barony a piece of land has been unfairly seized. The lord of Odell and the lord of Thurleigh, descendants of Walter and Hugh, take their seats with due solemnity, investigate the case, and decide that the land must be redistributed among the villeins, to every one his fair share of furlong strips. The four oldest gaffers duly measure out the strips cum pertica, with the "rod, pole, or perch" of our arithmetic books. Everyone is satisfied, except the monks of a distant priory, who have the right to a strip, but find that the four old men have awarded them the worst and stoniest ground!

The harm done by the Conquest. Has nobody then suffered by the Conquest? Certainly; the old aristocracy and many freeholders have suffered. The thegns disappear, either dead at Hastings or turned off their lands. Leofnoth, once the proud master of 100 hides, now is found holding one poor hide as Walter's sub-tenant. Very rarely do we find such a case as that of Tokig, whose father retains his land, and who lives to save William's life at Gerberoi. The thegns' "men" suffer. Lant was Leofnoth's "man," and in 1066 held $4\frac{3}{4}$ hides; in 1086 his widow and children are just keeping themselves alive on the king's alms on the three-quarters only, land worth 15s. T.R.E. and 3s. now, enough to be worked by a full team of oxen "but it is not there." This entry is as eloquent of misery as the Thurleigh entry is of prosperity. The small freeholders, the lesser thegns, the sokemen, all these suffer. If they are not killed in war or dead of starvation, they tend to disappear into the ranks of the villeins.

The two notorious crimes of William are the devastation of Yorkshire and the creation of the New Forest in Hampshire. He could be pitiless, when he thought there was political and military need for cruelty, as in Yorkshire. In the other case his motive was simply selfish pleasure. He loved the red deer more than the villeins; the chase was the sport of kings. We shudder at the thought of the fiendish severity of the forest-laws, the fines and the mutilation dealt out as punishment for poaching. Yet the actual harm done in Hampshire was slight; some 17,000 acres were thrown out of cultivation, poor and thin land that would barely repay the trouble of farming. On the other hand some land was already under cultivation in Sussex in 1086 which was waste in 1066.

Here we will take the census of the adult male popula tion as given us by Domesday Book. There were 1400 landed proprietors who held direct from the king; but when we deduct the small proprietors, only about 400 considerable landowners remain; 8000 sub-tenants, mostly Normans or other foreigners; 13,000 free men and 23,000 sokemen, thickest in the Danish eastern counties, 108,000 villeins, 88,000 bordars and other inferior rustics, 25,000 slaves, thickest in the western counties; 8000 townsmen, but the entries for the towns are incomplete; total, a little short of 300,000. But we have to allow for the northern counties; also for the Normans of lower rank, the personal retainers and soldiers of the barons, the traders and other settlers who came to the towns, and at a very early date all these must have intermarried with Saxons.

Character of the Norman baronage. We have said already that the positive benefit of the Conquest is that England has now a really strong central government. The incessant wars between Dane and Saxon have come to an end. Future wars at home will be between king and baronage, and as long as the king can hold his own, that is to say in all the early reigns except Stephen's, the villeins will farm in peace. His chief care was to repress the barons themselves, the very men who had won England for him and whom he had had to reward with lands. But he knew that in France the dukes and counts were too strong for the king; he himself as Duke of Normandy was that king's vassal in name, but practically independent. Therefore in England he was determined to be king indeed and the master of his barons. Sir Walter Scott has drawn much too strong a picture in Ivanhoe. The "bold bad baron" did exist, certainly; we shall soon tell of Robert of Bellême and Geoffrey of Mandeville, who had all the worst qualities of Front de Bœuf. But they only got their chance when the Crown was weak. Scott quotes a passage from the chronicle to show the misery of England under Norman rule, but it refers to the exceptional reign of Stephen. The Williams and Henries really governed, and although doubtless there were many individual cases of petty tyranny, the kings prevented general tyranny.

William governed by "the Laws of the Confessor," meaning the general code of Anglo-Saxon customs which were in force under Edward. He retained the office of sheriff and the shire-mote; and he meant that his Norman sheriffs should be his servants to help him to govern. The Saxon ordeal by hot water or iron remained in force; the Norman ordeal by battle was introduced. The custom of proving "Englishry" was new. The enforcing of a common law could not be immediately perfect under William, and we must wait for the Henries to finish his work. But his intention was to be a law-loving king.

After noticing that William meant to repress the tyranny of Norman barons, next we have to trace the good that the Normans did. Gradually as the centuries went by they quickened the life of the country. Their brighter wits were as leaven to the sluggish Anglo-Saxon mass. Adventurous, entergetic, daring, always wanting to do something, especially to fight, and above all quickwitted, they gave to England their virtues and their faults. Much of the energy we may now possess comes from our Norman, our stolidity from our Saxon ancestors. Love of adventure and conquest may be called piracy, but we, descended from both conquerors and conquered of Hastings, ought to be glad that the pirates won, for they were great leaders such as the Saxons wanted. Of course it was very long before the two races were finally blended together. The highest aristocracy never really coalesced with the conquered; they were by blood foreigners down to the Wars of the Roses, when they died out. But junior branches of the baronage, Normans of lesser mark, traders, townsmen, retainers, coalesced in course of time till there was a genuine English middle class and gentry of mixed blood. Chaucer, the first who wrote in English such as modern Englishmen can read without great trouble. bears a Norman name, le Chausseur or the Hosier. Naturally we look to the ports and towns for this mixed middle class, for the rustics would remain purely Saxon for a longer time. Normans settled in the Cinque Ports, in London, in various little towns under the shelter of great castles, especially on the borders of Wales, where they lived in garrison under town-laws imported from Normandy. Town-life always quickens the wits, for men there see more movement as they trade and talk with each other.

How William controlled the Barons. William abolished the great earldoms which Canute created. Mercia and Wessex were never again political divisions. Earls or Counts under him were little more than superior barons. But he allowed special powers to the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury so that they might fight the Welsh. We give to such earls a special name; they were Counts Palatine, meaning literally "Companions of the Palace." Shrewsbury ceased to have special powers when Henry I crushed Robert of Bellême. Chester, when the last earl died childless, became a royal county under Henry III. Durham was also a Palatine county under its Bishop; the old kingdom of Northumbria seems always to have retained some degree of independence, for it will be remembered how Harold had been unable to prevent the expulsion of Tostig, William allowed the Bishop of Durham to remain almost an independent prince so that he might defend the north from the Scots. Landowners in Chester and Durham held from earl or bishop, and not from the king. Very often a man was chosen to be Bishop of Durham because he was a good warrior rather than a good priest.

Elsewhere in England William gave to few barons any large portion of land in one place. He gave a manor here and another manor there, so that a barony was made up of many manors scattered in several counties, or in several parts of the same county. Thus if a baron rebelled he found it difficult to collect together his forces. William did not invent this system; he found Leotnoth's lands scattered, and gave them scattered to the Fleming. Eustace of Boulogne, remember, had most of his manors in Essex and the rest in no less than ten counties. Here and there a baron received land all in one block.

When we talk of the Feudal System we may be thinking of one or other of two things, a system of land-holding, or a military system. In the first sense the Feudal System existed in some degree already in England; the Saxon kings had under them earls and thegns, the earls had their thegns and men, and the thegns had their men. Nulle Terre sans Seigneur; every lord has an overlord. So under William there were churchmen, earls, barons, and small freeholders, all holding directly from him as tenants-in-chief, they, if they liked, sub-let some of their manors to sub-tenants, as Walter to Hugh. But William went a step further. On Salisbury Plain in 1086 he held a great muster in expectation of a Danish invasion, and there he demanded an oath of allegiance to be taken to him as supreme overlord by all sub-tenants. If Walter were living in France and were to rebel, Hugh would naturally follow him against the king of France; but here in England Hugh, following Walter, would be a rebel against William because of this oath.

The Feudal System was also a method of raising troops. William introduced from Normandy the entirely new system of Knight Service. He said something of this sort: "I have given to you barons the lands as I promised. You will pay me rent not in money but in men. When I summon my host for war, you, Eustace, for your 400 hides of land will bring 120 horsemen; you, Walter, for your 115 hides will bring 30 horsemen. You will raise, mount, equip, feed, and pay them, just as you choose, according to whatever bargain you may make with your sub-tenants; that is your affair, and I only want the men. I expect churchmen, if tenants-in-chief, to send me horsemen in the same way, the Abbot of Peterborough 60 and the Abbot of St Albans 6. They must be armed as at Hastings. But I shall not require their unpaid service for more than forty days in a year." A little explanation is required. The forty days seems to point to the suppression of a revolt in England or of a Danish raid, no war against the Welsh or Scots, much less against the French, could be finished within such a limit. The total of the army, if every baron and churchman raised his full number, would come to about 6000. If you read of an army of 30,000 or 60,000 in some book, you may be sure that it is a mistake. The word used by William for "horseman" was knight or niles; in later days a knight was a superior horseman, dubbed and wearing gilt spurs, who was attended to war by three or four inferior horsemen, and therefore 200 knights would then mean an army of 1000 horsemen of all ranks. But William's 6000 require no multiplication. The figures are not to be found in Domesday Book, which was a register of land only and not of soldiers.

Rochester Keep, reign of Henry I

When William required infantry he called out the fyrd or county militia. This was the old Saxon institution, but we have already seen how the thegns had served in the fyrd in place of, not at the head of, the general mass of the churls, though all free men were bound to serve when summoned. So now when the new Norman sheriffs were ordered to raise the fyrd in their counties, they summoned, not the villeins, but the smaller tenants-in-chief, the freeholders of small plots, the sokemen, whether Normans, or Saxons and Danes who had not been turned out, men who did not owe knight-service and were not rich enough to serve on horseback. We read that William I called out the East Anglian fyrd against Hereward. Rufus and Henry I raised similar levies against rebel barons, and the Archbishop of York in 1138 against the Scots.

No baron might raise a castle without the king's leave. Do not suppose that every ruined stone castle that you may see was erected immediately after 1066. There would not have been enough stone or stone-masons available. Both king and barons at first contented themselves with quickly built mounds of earth, timber towers, and outer courts of round or oval or horseshoe shape as the nature of the ground required. William himself wanted both masons and stones for his own use. He made a beginning with such mighty fortresses as the Tower of London, Corfe castle which was to guard the valuable Purbeck quarries in Dorset, Colchester castle which was planted in the centre of the old Roman town,^c and others. There were two types of Norman stone castles, one square and solid, the other round and hollow. The square keeps were mostly built on new sites, such as the three mentioned; they took a long time to finish, and most of them were built after William I's death. Sometimes a privileged baron was allowed to build a square keep alongside his original mound, for instance Strongbow or his father at Chepstow. More often, when the earth of the mound had settled down and was strong enough to carry stone, some fifty years or so after Hastings, a baron fitted to it a hollow shell-keep, for instance the Earl of Clare at his family seat of Clare in Suffolk and at Tonbridge in Kent. Always mistrust guide-books. You may be told that Norman work is Saxon or even Roman. But the Saxons were not good builders, and their burghs were towns with earthen walls designed to be the rallying points of the whole neighbourhood. The mound-and-court castles, whether afterwards strengthened with shell-keeps or not, were too small to protect a district, but just large enough to protect a lord and his family from a sudden Saxon rising; they are very common in Normandy itself, all over England wherever Norman barons settled, and in Wales and Ireland where Normans conquered in the next two centuries. Just a few are Saxon of the Confessor's reign, when Norman ideas first started in England.

The Tower of London ; the central or "white" tower was begun by William I, outer walls by John and Henry III

William did not demand danegeld from the barons and churchmen who owed him knight-service. Yet he got money from them in various ways. He had the right to demand aids on special occasions. When a baron died, the heir had to pay a relief before he could take the lands. If the heir were a minor, the king held the lands in wardship and enjoyed the revenue till the minor came of age; if the ward were a girl, he claimed the right to give her in marriage to some loyal or favourite noble. For instance, in the 13th century the heiress of Appleby and other wide lands in Westmorland and Yorkshire was given as ward to a quite minor baron, a Clifford of Herefordshire; Clifford's son married her, and thus an unimportant family was raised to a position of great influence and power in the north. These royal rights were all a matter of custom. We shall find the question coming up in the reigns of St Alban's Abbey; tower, transept, and part of nave, made of Roman tiles collected from the ruins of Verulamium; nave and aisles later, especially the projecting buttresses; the foreground was occupied by the monks' cloister, of which the ornamental arcading can be seen

Rufus and Henry I, and again in Magna Carta days, when the king claims more money from the barons than custom allows.

William, the Church and Papacy. If William had difficulty with his barons, he was just as awkwardly situated as regards the Roman Church. His barons fought at Hastings for him, yet his chief aim after Hastings was to keep them in subjection. So he was Pope Alexander's champion against the perjured Harold and received from him a consecrated banner, yet refused afterwards to acknowledge the overlordship of Rome. Hildebrand, who became Pope Gregory VII, was a most powerful successor to the papal throne and tried to enforce its claims of overlordship against all the rulers of western and central Europe. William resisted successfully. He, and he only, should have the right to choose bishops and abbots in England who held their lands as tenants-in-chief. No papal commands should be obeyed in England without the king's sanction.

In the place of Stigand he chose Lanfranc for the see of Canterbury, a learned and pious man, equally great as priest and as statesman. Finding Lanfranc loyal he gave him a free hand to reform the Church. The clergy were forced to put away their wives; foreign priests were attracted to England, of a better class and more learning than the Saxons; the Norman abbots were more zealous and ruled the monks more strictly. Whatever we may think of the Roman Church of later days, the closer connection between Rome and England was for the good of the country at this date, while the king's will prevented excessive papal interference. But Lanfranc's chief reform was the institution of clerical courts; all clergy, of whatever rank and even if only in the lowest clerical orders, were tried in these courts, and not by the sheriffs in the county courts. Trouble arose in consequence of this change in the reign of Henry II.

The Norman cathedral is as prominent a mark of the Conquest as is the Norman castle. Massive square or round pillars, square or round capitals, round arches and small round-headed windows, are the chief features. A century at least was required to build a cathedral. At Ely you can see the south-western tower with its six stories

Tewkesbury Abbey; Norman pillars and arches; east window and roof later

each in a slightly different style as the work of a different generation. Norman architecture looks very strong, but is deceptive. The very strongest work has lasted to our time, but even to-day constant repairs and rebuilding are necessary, as at Peterborough and Winchester. The central Norman tower at Ely fell with a crash, and Lincoln cathedral was entirely rebuilt. Of course money was required, for the medieval masons were free artists and had to be well paid. The great churches could not have been built by the bishops or monks without the aid of the Jewish money-lenders whom William brought over to England.

As the humble mound-castle to the Tower, so is the humble parish church to the proud cathedral. A belfry, a dark barn-like nave, a chancel, very plain but with some elaborate work to ornament the entrance-door or the chancel-arch, such is the usual pattern. Aisles and larger windows were added later, when some lord of the manor or even the villagers themselves could afford to add and rebuild. Often a Norman church was pulled down, and the ornamental stones of the door and chancel-arch rebuilt into the new 14th or 15th century fabric. In the case of cathedrals and parish churches alike rebuilding was necessary to give more air and more light.

Towards the end of his life William grew fat and coarse. In 1087 he fought Philip I of France, and captured and burnt the town of Mantes on the Seine. His horse stumbled on the hot ashes, and he was so badly shaken that he died of the effects. He had been a great ruler, stern and cruel to rebels, severe tax-gatherer, lover of the red deer, author of the forest-laws, yet promoter of law and order. We have described his work. He made the English nation by bringing together the two races, the Anglo-Saxon-Danish and the Norman. He made modern England possible.

Suggestions to students:

1. Make a list of titles and words, find the derivations and trace the changes in meanings, and draw your conclusions; e.g. earl, count, shire, county, sheriff, alderman, borough, villein.

2. Make a list of the villages and towns near your home, and classify them according to terminations; e.g. Scarborough and Whitby.

3. Make a list of common Norman and Saxon words; e.g. beef and ox. See Ivanhoe, chap 1.

4. Visit some village and look at the mound or stone castle, or manor-house, mill, dovecot, vestiges of the furlong strips; the latter, it may be, have not yet been ploughed up on some river-bank or hill-side.

Then get the Victoria County History, and read the Domesday entry of the village you have explored. Picture to yourself the old life.

Books. Green's Short History; Miss Bateson's Medieval England, Canon Isaac Taylor's Words and Places; Mr C. R. L. Fletcher's Introductory History, and especially look at his map of a manor.

WILLIAM II, 1087—1100

ANSELM ARCHBISHOP, 1093 FIRST CRUSADE, 1099.

The Rule of the Succession. This is the greatest difficulty in the history of any country. We can understand the rule, "Might is Right." We can understand the right of the first-born to succeed when sanctioned by the custom of many centuries; it may bring a weak or a bad man to the throne, but it prevents civil war. William I had been a mere conqueror, and had held both Duchy of Normandy and Kingdom of England by his strength of hand and mind. So he imposed his will upon Normandy and England, being a law unto himself. He decided that the eldest son should inherit Normandy, the ancestral possession, and the second should take England, the conquered possession. This rule applied to baronial families also. So the second son, William Rufus, of the red face and the red temper, became king of England. The old Anglo-Saxon Witenagemote had been superseded by the Great Council of the chief barons, who claimed the right to award the throne. Yet a strong heir—and Rufus, however vile his character, was at least strong—had no trouble in securing his election. Archbishop Lanfranc declared for him and crowned him.

Duke Robert and his supporters. The eldest son, Robert, Duke of Normandy, was supported by those barons who hoped that on the Conqueror's death they would be able to seize the power which he had denied them. Rufus was rough and masterful, Robert generous and easy-going.

At the head of these barons was Odo of Bayeux, whom the Conqueror had previously imprisoned and Rufus released; with him was Roger of Montgomery, a very rich noble, who was Earl of Shrewsbury and of Arundel, had seized lands on the borders of Wales and built a castle on the Severn which he named Montgomery after his Norman home, and also held vast estates in Normandy. It was very powerful barons such as these that had most resented the Conqueror's strict rule. But Lanfranc steadily supported Rufus; the lesser landowners and the Anglo-Saxon population rallied to him. Odo surrendered at Rochester and the revolt died away. Robert retained the Duchy, but Rufus secured the Kingdom. But the question now at stake was this: shall England and Normandy remain for ever apart, or shall one conquer or reconquer the other? The answer would depend upon the strength and fitness to rule of Rufus or Robert or their successors.

Strong and brutal government. Rufus had promised a great deal when he wanted help, but thought nothing of breaking his word when he was in power. The difference between the two Williams is this; the father was just, though he stood strongly upon his rights; the son was brutal and demanded more than his rights. The custom of the feudal system allowed reliefs and wardship. Rufus exacted excessive reliefs before he permitted an heir to take up his father's property; when there was an heiress, or the heir was a minor, he seized the property and revenue, then exacted heavy reliefs when the minor came of age, or made the girl marry against her will. He levied very heavy danegeld, and demanded it for their demesne lands even from those tenants-in-chief who claimed to be exempt on the ground that they owed knight-service. He adopted the trick of keeping vacant a bishopric or abbey on the death of the bishop or abbot, appropriating for himself the revenue of the lands. For instance, on Lanfranc's death he refused to appoint a successor for four years; then falling ill and fearing death he appointed in a panic the learned and pious Anselm. His minister and adviser in all his extortions was Ranulf Flambard, whom he made Bishop of Durham. The memorials of this worldly priest, the exact opposite of Anselm, are the Norman work of Durham Cathedral and of Christ Church Abbey in Hampshire; such a powerful and rich favourite could afford to build strong and beautiful work which has lasted to our day.

Durham Cathedral

Scotland and South Wales. The most important political event of the reign was the occupation of Cumberland, from which the Scots were driven, followed by the fortification of Carlisle as a military centre against Scottish raids. On the other side of England William I had already erected the New Castle on the Tyne, and Flambard made Durham very strong. Thus both roads from Scotland were guarded. King Malcolm did homage to Rufus, as previously to William I, yet not full feudal homage. He was killed at Alnwick in one of his raids into Northumberland.

William I, it will be remembered, had conferred special powers on the Earls of Chester and Shrewsbury. Rufus followed the same policy. He gave permission to various barons to invade South Wales; whatever land they could win by the sword they might keep as their own. It was a cheap method of conquering Wales; at the same time it gave to the Normans plenty of the fighting and adventure which were so dear to their hearts, and diverted their warlike energies away from England where the king did not wish them to be too strong for him. Lands thus conquered were called marches, meaning literally "borders"; the conquering Normans were known as marcher lords. Norman castles immediately sprang up in South Wales, but a full century of vigorous warfare was required before the Norman marchers subdued the coast from Chepstow on the Wye to Pembroke. Robert Fitz Hamon conquered Glamorgan; his heiress married Henry I's illegitimate son Robert Earl of Gloucester, and we shall find the lordship of Glamorgan very important later. Meanwhile the Earls of Chester frequently fought the North Welsh, but made no permanent conquests.

Anselm and the Investitures Pope after pope followed the example of Hildebrand and tried to gain for Rome power over England. Rufus resisted as keenly as ever his father had done. In particular the choice of bishops and abbots by the king was offensive to the Church. This is the question of the investitures; should the king, or the pope and archbishop, invest a new bishop, that is, confer on him his sacred vestments, the ring and the staff which were the symbols of the holy office? Another point was: which of two rival popes should be acknowledged in England? Rufus claimed that no pope could be recognized here at all unless with his consent. Anselm, for all his unworldly piety and quiet temper, possessed the true courage which quiet men often show. He stood up manfully for the freedom of the Church against a domineering king. Yet opposition to Rufus proved useless, and Anselm retired to Rome. We admire Anselm's quiet pluck and devotion to the Church, and we acknowledge that Rufus was impious and brutal. Still, Anselm wished to exalt the power of the Pope in England, and it may be said that William was in some degree patriotic in resisting this endeavour.

The Crusades begin: Jerusalem captured. Now we have the period of the Crusades. The same popes who wished to interfere so much in English politics also showed their zeal for the Church by preaching a holy war. The Arabs, the original followers of the prophet Mohammed, had seized Jerusalem as far back as 637, but had allowed Christians to visit the sacred buildings. Now a fierce tribe of Turks, Mohammedans by conversion, had conquered the city and persecuted pilgrims. This gave a good chance to an ambitious pope such as Hildebrand. He did not live to see the first crusade, but prepared the way for it. Pope Urban and Peter the Hermit appealed to Christian Europe.

The first attempts, without organization and caused by momentary excitement, naturally ended in failure. But some Norman and French lords—for no crowned monarchs took part—worked their way through overland to Constantinople, and finally took Jerusalem in 1099. Godfrey of Bouillon was elected the first Christian King of Jerusalem: several other kingdoms were set up, as at Antioch and Tyre. The two celebrated orders of military monks, the Knights of the Temple and the Knights of St John of Jerusalem, were founded. An outlet for energy and enthusiasm was thus given to many a western lord, and there was a constant supply of such men to reinforce the crusaders. But little keenness was shown in England. The first crusade only touches our history because Robert of Normandy joined it, and was thus absent from England when his brother Rufus died, mysteriously shot by an arrow in the New Forest.

HENRY I, 1100—1135

1106 TINCHEBRAI, COMPROMISE WITH ANSELM.

Rufus had reigned by his father's will and had died childless. Was his elder or his younger brother to succeed? There was no rule to which to refer. Therefore naturally the stronger man, being moreover on the spot, had the advantage. Robert was on his way home from Palestine; Henry promptly hurried off to Winchester, secured the royal treasure, was chosen by a handful of the barons who behaved as though they represented the whole of the Great Council, and was crowned at Westminster within a week of Rufus' death. Evidently he won the crown by his own readiness and quickness rather than by the votes of his few supporters. Anselm being in exile and the Archbishop of York being ill, the ceremony was performed by the Bishop of London.

The Charter, a bid for popularity. Henry was as strong as his father and less brutal than his brother. He was well educated, and was called Beaucherc, "the Scholar." He could be cruel and tyrannical, and also faithless, but was clever enough to begin his reign by a solemn promise to give up Rufus' evil ways. He issued a charter, a parchment with the royal seal attached, by which he promised that the Church should be free and no bishoprics kept vacant; that reliefs and other sums of money should be demanded only according to custom, and fairness; that land held by knight-service should not be taxed for danegeld. This means that he bound himself to govern like the Conqueror, strictly and according to his royal rights, but not with the extravagant tyranny of Rufus. It has been said¹ of him that he was only "playing to the gallery," making a bid for support and popularity, because Robert was expected to be home soon. Indeed Robert reached Normandy that same autumn, just too late to have any chance; he had a knack of just failing. When Henry was secure on his throne he broke every promise he had made.

He married Edith of Scotland, daughter of Margaret and Malcolm, but her name was changed to Maud; Margaret was sister of Edgar the Atheling, so that the new Queen was of the blood royal of Alfred, and this pleased the Anglo-Saxons. Also he pleased the nation by imprisoning Flambard.

A typical bad dangerous Baron. Of course there was a rising of the barons who wished to gain power, and had as their excuse that they preferred Robert. When Roger of Montgomery, who had opposed Rufus, died, his English lands went to his second son Hugh, his Norman lands to his elder son Robert. Hugh died childless. Therefore the question was the same for this baronial family as for the kingdom; should Hugh be succeeded by the elder or the third brother? The elder's claim was admitted. He held the English earldoms of Shrewsbury and Arundel, the Welsh marches of Montgomery, his father's lands in Normandy, his mother's in Bellême, and his wife's in Ponthieu; Bellême and Ponthieu were independent lordships adjoining Normandy. He is always known as Robert of Bellême. He has left behind an evil memory as a cool, calm, and outrageously cruel baron of the worst type. Having thus as elder brother all these lands on both sides of the sea, he naturally supported the claim of Robert of Normandy to be ruler on both sides of the sea.

¹ Mr J. Horace Round.

Duke Robert crossed to England in 1101, and Henry marched to meet him, making frantic appeals and promises to catch the loyalty of the barons. After all, Robert came to terms and returned to Normandy. Then Henry turned on the other Robert, him of Bellême, captured his castles, stripped him of his earldoms, and exiled him with all his family. The people applauded the king's victory and decision. The lands were divided, Shrewsbury ceased to be a "palatine" earldom, Montgomery became a royal town, and no baron was suffered to take this Robert's place for fear he should become strong enough to dictate to his king.

Conquest of Normandy from England. The two Roberts plotted in Normandy against Henry, but he was beforehand with them, and took the offensive by invading Normandy. At Tinchebrai in 1106 he was easily victorious, and the Kingdom and the Duchy were united for yet another century. Thus, just forty years after Hastings, England conquered and annexed Normandy; to the Anglo-Saxon levies who fought at Tinchebrai it seemed to be a revenge for Hastings. Henry kept his brother Robert a prisoner for very many years, yet treated him well; he first pardoned Robert of Bellême, then imprisoned him; another rebel he blinded.

There was yet more fighting in France. Robert had a son, William Clito; Louis VI of France, a stronger king than his ancestors, who was bent on raising the power of his crown, supported him. There was war; Henry won another victory at Brémule in 1119, and clung fast to Normandy. In the following year, Henry's only son, William, was wrecked in the "White Ship" and drowned. Who then should succeed to the united Kingdom and Duchy? Henry had a daughter Maud or Matilda, who first married the Emperor. The Emperor was supposed to be the successor of the Roman Cæsars, but at this time he had all his land and power in Germany. Secondly she married Geoffrey, Count of Anjou, a country lying south-west of Normandy, with Maine between them as a buffer state; the Angevins were thorough Frenchmen and bitter enemies of the Normans. Henry made his barons swear to accept Maud after his death in spite of this national hatred. From her first husband she is known as the Empress Maud.

Bargain between Henry and Anselm. The question of the investitures had still to be settled. The Church still continued to object to a worldly king nominating bishops, while Henry objected to an outside power interfering with his royal rights, religious and national claims conflicted. A bargain was made between Henry and Anselm, who returned from exile. Any new bishop or abbot was to be chosen by the cathedral clergy or monks; there was frequently a monastery attached to a cathedral, where the monks conducted the church services, while the bishop ruled the diocese. The bishop or abbot, when thus chosen, was to receive the ring and staff of office from the archbishop, but to do homage to the king in the King's Court for the land attached to the bishopric or the abbey. Thus the Church was free, yet the king secured the really important thing, the homage. Such bargains, where each claimant both gives and takes, remain in force just so long as each is sensible and content. When in some future reign some strong pope becomes ambitious, the bargain will be broken.

In this reign there was a movement to improve and restore the old vigour of monastic life. Stephen Harding, an Englishman, was Abbot of Cîteaux in Burgundy; his monks lived under very severe rules, bound to poverty and the services of the church. The Cistercians, as they were called, founded a great many abbeys in England, chiefly on deserted moorlands; they were good farmers, worked hard, introduced sheep from Spain, and thus greatly assisted to increase the wealth of the nation. Many of their celebrated houses were in Yorkshire, where they did much to repopulate the land devastated by the Conqueror. Lands were given showing buildings at 1840 A.D.

Tintern Abbey

GREAT PLAN FOUNTAINS ABBEY
 1/4" = 100'

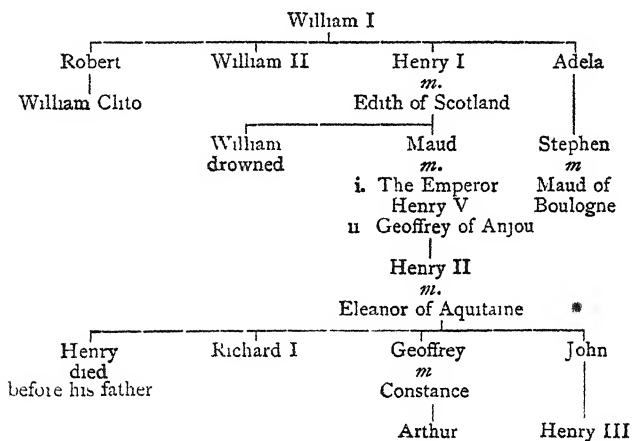

them by many a worldly baron for the good of his soul, and the abbeys grew rich though the individual monks were poor. But they were quite outside the national life; they owed no obedience to the bishops, but only to the pope, to whom they sent much money. There was jealousy between the "regular" monks who lived by strict rules and the "secular" clergy of the parish parsonages.

A reign of Law and Justice. We have seen that Henry began his reign with promises to his barons, yet he broke them. His taxation was very heavy. Yet he was hard chiefly on the great barons whom it was necessary to keep down. He was a lover of order and law, and was called the Lion of Justice. His chief title to fame is that he organized The King's Court, the Curia Regis, to be the supreme law-court of the land; its place to-day is held by the House of Lords, which is our final Court of Appeal¹. Also he sent out his judges to make circuits, and hold sittings or assizes in the various counties; they were called Itinerant Judges, and were to help the sheriffs, or it may be to override unjust sheriffs, so that the King's Law might be supreme. This system was much needed, because throughout England there were many varying customs, West Saxon customs, Mercian customs, Danish customs, in the different districts; the Norman barons as lords of their manors might be tyrannical in their manor-courts; the sheriffs might fail to do their duty and be in league with tyrannical barons. Henry's judges were his royal servants. They were terribly severe; hanging, quartering, mutilation, branding, blinding, as well as the old Saxon ordeal by fire or hot water, sound unpleasant to modern ears. But better the severest King's Law than no law at all, evil abuses can be abolished in time, and then the Law itself remains and is good. Henry also organized The Court of Exchequer, which looked after the royal moneys. The great officers of the Crown were the Justiciar, or Lord Chief Justice, who acted as a sort of viceroy when the king was absent, the Treasurer, the Chancellor, and the other judges and sheriffs. Henry chose them from among the less powerful baronial families; he created an official baronage, as it were, a baronage of his servants who relied on his favour and would be loyal to him, so as to counterbalance the great land-owning barons. "Good man he was, and there was great awe of him; in his day no man dared to harm another."

¹ Only a few lords learned in the law sit and vote when it is thus acting as a Court.

THE ANARCHY, 1135—1154

BATTLE OF THE STANDARD, 1138.

When Henry died, the value of a strong government was at once seen, also the need of a fixed rule of succession. Election to a throne may seem to be just and natural; the Great Council, as the Witan before them, may claim the right to elect. But some one is offended, the electors hope to gain profit and to be more important than the elected, civil war results, and from civil war comes anarchy. Rufus and Henry I had seized the throne as strong men; Maud was weak. Not only did the barons object to her as a woman; they also hated Anjou, her husband's country. They saw their chance to assert their importance, and they chose Stephen, son of Adela, and grandson of the Conqueror. Curiously enough, he had an elder brother, who, however, gave way to him. He held large estates in England through his wife Maud, heiress of Eustace of Boulogne; to avoid confusion we call her Queen Maud. He had himself taken the oath of allegiance, as demanded by Henry, to support the Empress Maud. It has been said of him, in the words of the historian Tacitus which were used of an old Roman Emperor, "Imperii capax nisi imperasset"; if he had never been king, everyone would have thought him just the right man to have been king. He was elected by the citizens of London, as well as by some of the barons, and was acknowledged by the pope.

Geoffrey of Anjou was not very useful to his wife the Empress. He wished to subdue Normandy to Anjou, and this set the Normans against her. But she had an ally in King David of Scotland, her uncle; Robert of Gloucester, her half-brother, was a powerful supporter, being lord of the wide lands of Gloucester and of the march of Glamorgan.

Civil War and Feudal Ruffianism. The facts of the civil war are not at all interesting. In 1138 David invaded England; the northerners cared little enough for Stephen, but they were not going to let their land be plundered by Scots. They turned out to battle under the Archbishop of York, and set up the sacred banners of St Peter of York, St Wilfred of Ripon, and St John of Beverley; they were mostly infantry, spears and short-bows intermingled. They beat the Scots near Northallerton on the old Roman road, where now runs the main line of the N.E.R. Their victory is known as the Battle of the Standard.

Stephen was taken prisoner at Lincoln in 1141. Queen Maud continued to fight, and in her turn captured Robert of Gloucester. Stephen and Gloucester were then exchanged. The Empress Maud was besieged in Oxford, and only saved herself by escaping by night over the snow, where her white dress is said to have made her invisible to her enemies.

A prominent self-seeking baron of the period was Geoffrey of Mandeville. He sold his services to Stephen for an earldom, deserted to Maud and was by her made Constable of the Tower, went over a second time to Stephen, and a second time to Maud, and on each occasion received some new honour. He was at the head of a band of terrible ruffians, and was notorious for his cruelty; he was finally excommunicated and was killed in a fight. His career is only of interest because he was a typical scoundrel, gaining power because two rivals had to bribe scoundrels. There were others like him, and a cry went up to heaven against the wicked Normans. It is therefore in reading the abominations of this reign, the cruelties and the tortures for the extortion of money, the erection of private castles, the bad coinage issued by the barons from their private mints, that we can appreciate the services to England of the strong kings, the Williams and the Henry who preceded, and the Henry who came after Stephen. The misery of the country was exceptional during this anarchy, but many people still think that all the Normans in all the reigns were just as bad; whereas such monsters of iniquity could only exist under a weak elected king.

Geoffrey of Anjou was able in 1144 to reduce Rouen, and the Empress Maud, at last despairing of beating Stephen, went to join him there. Geoffrey died shortly after. Their son Henry was very young, but he was strong and ready to take up the cause. Headed by Archbishop Theobald, the Church and most of the barons forced upon Stephen the Treaty of Wallingford in 1153, Stephen, whose eldest son had recently died, was to continue to reign, but Henry of Anjou was to succeed him. Next year Stephen died, and the unhappy reign came to an end.

HENRY II, 1154—1189

1164. THE CONSTITUTIONS OF CLARENDON.

1174. END OF THE BARONS' WAR, CAPTURE OF WILLIAM
THE LION.

Henry II was king of England by the compact made at Wallingford; Duke of Normandy by right of his mother Maud, and lord of Maine by the conquest by William I; Count of Anjou and Touraine through his father Geoffrey, though he had to fight his younger brother, another Geoffrey, before he could secure his power; lastly, Duke of Aquitaine and Poitou by his wife Eleanor, the divorced wife of the king of France. He was thus a European monarch, far stronger than the French king, whose real sway only extended through the Ile de France, a small ring of territory round Paris. Yet for Normandy and Anjou he was in name that king's vassal. Of course each part of his possessions was connected with the rest only by the personal rule of himself, just as the Georges held Great Britain and Hanover, but each country had a separate government.

Henry's personal work and character. His first duty to England was to restore order, to take back into his own hands the royal lands that Stephen had given to his supporters as bribes, to pull down the many castles that had been built with or without Stephen's leave, and to see that the villeins could plough and reap in peace. Henry was just the man for the work. He was prodigiously strong of body, not very tall, but thickset and bull-necked, no exertion could tire him, and he would ride all day long till his followers were dropping with utter fatigue. He would rush from country to country, from shire to shire, to see that all his officials were doing their duty and that law was administered as it should be. In general it may be said that he renewed and perfected his grandfather's work, he created afresh, after the civil war, the official baronage, the body of royal judges and servants, by means of whom Henry I had restrained the feudal baronage. His rule has been called "the Angevin Conquest" in contrast to William's Norman Conquest of England. No doubt the proudest barons regarded him as an outsider from Anjou, but his work was but the continuation of the strong rule of the three genuine Normans. On the other side we must put his passionate nature; he could be furiously angry, even to the verge of apoplexy. This, his worst trait, he bequeathed to his son John, who writhed on the ground and bit the rushes on the floor after being forced to sign the Great Charter. His gift of leadership he bequeathed to Richard.

His right-hand man in the work of law and order was at first Thomas Becket, who was brought to his notice by Theobald. The Church, as seen by what was done at Wallingford, was entirely in favour of order. Becket was the son of a Norman trader in London, he was made Chancellor, and was the king's bosom friend.

Reforms: Scutage, and the Jury System. One of Henry's earliest expeditions was against Toulouse, to which his wife laid claim. This war in the extreme south of France made him reform the system of war-taxation. Danegeld was finally given up. Henry I had allowed vassals to pay scutage or shield-money instead of sending horsemen according to their due service as tenants-in-chief; Henry II systematised the payment of scutage. Danegeld had been paid at the rate of so many shillings on every hide of land; scutage was imposed at a mark (13s. 4d.) or two marks in place of each horseman. Two marks equal forty eightpences, and eightpence was the daily wage of a hired horseman. Therefore a baron owing the service of 20 horsemen for the feudal forty days might pay $20 \times 40 \times 8d.$ As no war could be finished within that absurd limit, another system was also coming into vogue; a baron might bring to the king's army fewer horsemen than he owed, and would then serve for a longer period. With the scutage money the king hired mercenaries. But his chief barons usually preferred to serve in person. If every one had paid, the king would have got some £10,000; as a matter of fact, some paid and some fought, and he obtained from £2500 to £5000. Notice that the word "horseman" or "knight" or "miles" is used here in the sense in which William I originally used it, as a common trooper, not as a "dubbed knight." Gifts and aids, dona and auxilia, were raised for war from the shires and towns; rents were raised on royal lands. Thus the war-tax came to some £3000 on an average from all sources. It was demanded seven times in the reign¹.

Henry raised ordinary revenue by other methods. The Jews were regarded as the king's chattels, and he got from them some £3000 yearly. We need not pity them very much, for they lent money at high rates of interest and were hated in proportion. The Forest Laws were still very severe; besides loss of life or limb for actual poaching on the deer, fines were inflicted for any kind of trespass. Then the profits of the courts of justice in the towns were "farmed" out; sums of money were paid to the king for city rights; but as the towns prospered by good government and peace they could afford to pay for the support of the king. The ordinary peace revenue of the crown is calculated to have come to £20,000 yearly.

The law-courts of the land were reorganized. The Curia Regis, the King's Court, was divided; the king's advisers in matters of state were separated from the highest judges; these latter were formed into the Court of the King's Bench, which had to decide the most important law cases that came up for the king's own hearing.

¹ Sir James Ramsay, The Angevin Empire.

The Itinerant Judges still went on circuit; Henry II gave them additional powers by the Assize of Clarendon. This means that the king, sitting in state at Clarendon in Wiltshire, issued a royal edict to give powers to the royal judges who went round to groups of counties. They were to have sole power over cases of murder and theft; the lords of the manor might not in their manor-courts hang their own villeins for these serious crimes. The king thus protected the peasant by sending judges who had the sole right to hang him. Criminals were to be "presented" by juries of men living in the neighbourhood; then they had to undergo the ordeal, and were punished if deemed guilty. One more step was necessary, but it was not taken till the reign of John, wonderful to relate; then, by the action of the Church, the ordeal was condemned, and a jury was to decide whether a man was really guilty.

By the Great Assize the system of trial by jury was extended to cases about property. If men disputed as to who owned a piece of land, the rivals were no longer to fight each other in the ordeal by combat, but a jury in the presence of a royal judge was to decide on oath. Towns over which great barons had feudal rights did not gain such privileges so early; in the celebrated case of the town of Leicester, the earl, thinking it foolish that two kinsmen should fight to decide their claim to some land, granted trial by jury on condition that 3*d.* was paid to him yearly for each house in the High Street that had a gable.

The question of the Clerical Courts. Becket was made Archbishop in 1162, and immediately was seen a wonderful change in him. From being a statesman and man of the world of gay manners, he became austere; his devotion to the king he changed to devotion to the Church.

The chief question at issue was whether clergymen accused of criminal offences should be tried in the King's Courts, or in the Church Courts as established by Lanfranc. It seems strange to us that the crimes of the clergy should be so prominent, but the word "clergy" covered all those in any way connected with the Church or belonging to the lowest clerical orders. Becket contended that a cleric convicted of crime in a clerical court should be degraded, and only for a second offence might he be tried in an ordinary court. But Pope Alexander, not wishing to quarrel with Henry, gave Becket but weak support. In 1164 Henry issued the Constitutions of Clarendon by which he asserted his claim over all clergy even for first offences. Becket proudly defied both king and nobles; when shouts of "Traitor" were raised against him, he retorted, "Were I a knight, my sword should answer that foul taunt." But he fled the country, and it seemed as if Henry had won his object. At last he returned. But then a new trouble arose. Henry had his son crowned during his own lifetime by the Archbishop of York; Becket excommunicated the bishops who attended the ceremony, for Canterbury had been insulted. Then Henry let drop some angry words. Some knights who heard them, without waiting for further orders, crossed the sea, hastened to Canterbury, and murdered Becket in his own cathedral (1170). All Christendom was aghast, and put the blame on the king, whose words had been taken too literally. Becket murdered had a greater power than Becket living. Henry gave up the Constitutions, restored the clerical courts, and even did public penance. Becket was canonized as a saint; pilgrims flocked to Canterbury, and deserting the high altar laid their offerings on the shrine of St Thomas. Chaucer two centuries later called him "the holy blissful martyr," and at his tomb miracles were said to have been done.

English Pope and Irish Church. Adrian IV, otherwise Nicholas Breakspear, is the only Englishman who has occupied the see of St Peter. Quite early in the reign he had authorized Henry to invade Ireland so as to bring the Irish Church into communion with Rome. In the dark ages when the Angles and Saxons were heathens you must remember how Irish missionaries crossed to Scotland and the north of England; also during all the period of Danish invasions and war they still preached in western Europe, while the power of Rome was growing. Now Rome was strong, and the Irish Church less energetic. It was natural that Adrian should wish to have the honour of uniting Ireland to Rome through his influence over England.

Ireland had a high king and subordinate kings and chieftains. There was much quarrelling and war. In the coast towns, such as Dublin and Waterford, were Danish settlers in whose hands was all the trade. Opposite to them in South Wales were the Norman lords marchers, as adventurous and ready for war as any of their ancestors. Diarmid or Dermot of Leinster appealed for help to Richard of Clare, Earl of Pembroke and Chepstow, otherwise known as Strongbow, and Henry carelessly gave him permission to invade Ireland on the strength of Adrian's permission. We cannot with any degree of truth talk of an English conquest of Ireland; Strongbow's comrades and men were Normans and Welsh, both of them war-loving races, and it was just such a private adventure as their souls loved.

In 1169 a sort of advanced guard went over to help Dermot, who cared neither about him nor about the question of the Irish Church; in 1170 Strongbow followed. Some 300 Norman mailed horse and 2000 Welsh foot went with them, but these were the champion long-bow archers of South Wales. Their historian, Gerald Barry, himself of mixed Norman and Welsh blood, describes with enthusiasm how Irish and Danes went down in battle before the combined horse and archers. Indeed the war is chiefly important for the tactics employed. Had it not been fought in an obscure corner of Europe, had not the supply of good Welsh bowmen been limited, the victories won by such a combination must have attracted more attention. But a century had yet to go by before Edward I would train his Englishmen in imitation of the South Welsh to use a genuine long-bow, and nearly two centuries before the triumphs of Crecy and Poitiers.

Henry was rendered anxious by Strongbow's success. He went over himself and demanded homage from the conquerors for the lands that they had won; they were to do knight-service to him, and a Justiciar was appointed to govern for him. No king could afford to let his barons hold land in a new country not subject to his control. The whole of Ireland was not conquered, but only a part of the south and east. In the track of the original Clares and Fitzgeralds followed de Burghs or Burkes, Lacys, Butlers, Wellesleys, Beresfords, Talbots, and it is said of them that they became more Irish than the Irish themselves. From these Norman-Irish families have come some of our greatest orators, statesmen, soldiers, and sailors.

Revolts of Henry's barons and sons. Strong rule and systematic taxation goaded the baronage into war. They had helped Henry against Becket, but now that he was under a cloud because of the murder they seized their chance to rebel. His sons also were masterful and quarrelsome, and wanted him to give them independent duchies in France. William the Lion of Scotland and Louis VII of France were not slow to join the combination. It was so formidable a crisis that Henry considered it to be a judgment for Becket's murder, for which he therefore did penance. Yet he was quickly successful. His Justiciar and other officials with shire-levies put down the barons in England; William was luckily captured in a fog near Alnwick in Northumberland; Louis was beaten back from Rouen (1173 and 1174).

Two results followed. The king of Scotland regained his freedom by the Treaty of Falaise, by which he agreed to do full feudal homage to Henry; no such full homage had ever before been done to any king of England. Secondly, in 1181 Henry issued the Assize of Arms, by which all free men were ordered to have ready by them arms and armour, whether horseman's or infantryman's equipment, in proportion to their wealth, and these were to be inspected at regular intervals. In fact Henry had been so much pleased by the loyalty of the mass of the nation to him that he felt able to trust the shire-levies; therefore he wished them to be always ready to serve in a national army.

To the end of his life his sons gave him much trouble, helped by the next king of France, Philip the August; Henry's wife Eleanor also helped them. On one occasion he was only saved from being captured by Richard by the intervention of William the Marshal. It is claimed for this fine and loyal noble that to save his king he actually charged and unhorsed Cœur de Lion himself. Yet even such devotion could not save Henry from sorrow. In 1189 he died in bitterness of heart after hearing that his youngest, whom strangely enough he loved, even the vile John, was in league against him. This was the end of a stormy life, which had yet done in 35 years incalculable good to the country. "The credit of the reforms of this reign must undoubtedly be ascribed to Henry himself. His enemies taunted him with them, as being simply dictated by the wish to fill his pocket. His ends may have been selfish, but, as has been remarked of his grandfather, his selfish ends coincided with the wants of the nation¹."

Before he died news had arrived of Saladin's capture of Jerusalem. A crusade was being preached, and a property-tax called the Saladin tithe was being levied both in France and in England.

¹ Sir James Ramsay.

RICHARD I, 1189—1199

CAPTURE OF ACRE, AND BATTLE OF ARSUF, 1191.

The ever famous Richard Cœur de Lion succeeded. The eldest brother, whose coronation had angered Becket, had died before their father. Richard had been a bad son to Henry II, and an ally of King Philip; he lived to experience treachery from the same Philip, and also from his own brother John. But at first the crusade was all important and Philip was his ally.

A contrast: Saladin and Cœur de Lion. Salah-ed-din, "the Honour of the Faith," known to us all as Saladin, is one of the most picturesque figures in history. By nationality he was a Kurd. His father had risen from being a captain of mercenaries to hold an important government; Saladin rose higher, and became Sultan of Egypt and real ruler of all the Mohammedan countries up to the Euphrates, though the Caliph at Baghdad was nominal head of the faith. The life-work of Saladin was to unite Egyptians and Syrians, Arabs and Turks, whose jealousies had allowed the Christians to take Jerusalem in 1099. Now the Mohammedans were united, the Christians disunited. He destroyed an army at Hittin¹ in Galilee, ten miles from Nazareth, in 1187; Jerusalem fell to him at once, and the Christians who yet survived only held a few coast towns and some strong castles inland. All historians of the East confess that Scott has given a splendidly true picture of Saladin in The Talisman. He was generous, noble-minded, merciful, and honourable, in an age when only too often greed and faithlessness stained the name of the crusaders. But, to make his novel more exciting, Scott invented the scene at the oasis, the tournament, the personal meeting between Richard and Saladin, etc. On the other hand Richard was not only a daring fighter who delighted in downright smashing blows; he was a very cool and clever general. Yet Scott's picture of Richard cleaving a solid iron bar with one sweep of his two-handed sword, while Saladin with his sharp scimitar ripped a silk cushion, gives us a good idea of the difference between the two men. They were types of West and East, force and dexterity.

¹ See map on p. 469.

Successes in the Third Crusade. Richard raised all the money that he could, by the Saladin tithe, by sale of his rights over Scotland for £10,000, by putting up to auction all sorts of offices and even the posts of sheriffs and chancellor, and by persecuting the Jews. He trusted that his Justiciar would keep England quiet, and pretended to believe in the loyalty of John. Even if England and Normandy had to be left kingless, he held it to be absolutely necessary that so great a warrior should go to the East to stem the tide of Saladin's conquests. He started in June, 1190, crossed France, and embarking at Marseilles sailed by way of Sicily and Cyprus. Just a year later he reached Acre, where he found his ally Philip of France besieging the place, though he was in turn besieged by Saladin. Richard at once put new energy into the war; in spite of heat and sickness he pressed the siege by mines and engines, and Acre fell in July. Then occurred the celebrated quarrel, and Philip turned home to France.

Richard led the remaining host southwards along the coast, a slow and careful march. The men were strung out in a long line, baggage and infantry next to the sea, heavy cavalry next to them, and an outer screen of crossbowmen and other foot. Saladin's light horse and mounted bowmen swarmed on the flank and in the rear. On a plain near Arsuf, between Acre and Jaffa, Richard planned to lure on the enemy to attack in a mass; when they swarmed in on the Christian's flank so thickly and closely that they could not easily ride off again, the outer screen opened its ranks and the heavy knights charged; man to man, and horse to horse, the Christians were much the superior and rode through the infidels. Saladin fled and confessed to defeat. The army marched on to Jaffa.

Hospitaller and Templar: the Hospitaller's armour has the extra pieces which came into use a little before 1300.

Final failure, jealousies and return. Twice did Richard try to push through to Jerusalem, in December, 1191 and June, 1192; twice he turned back in bitterness, and engaged in the defence of Jaffa. Next October he quitted Palestine. The reasons of his failure are easy to see. The jealousy which existed between Philip and Richard, between the Christians already in Palestine and these new crusaders who had come to help them, a jealousy so strongly depicted by Scott, wrecked the third crusade; on the other hand the sultan's will was law to all the races of Mohammedans. The heat, dust, insects, difficulty of finding water, and consequent sickness of both man and horse, told very heavy against the westerners who seemed

Crusader from Temple Church; typical armour between
A.D. 1100 and 1300
(roughly) unable to adapt themselves to the climate, but rode heavy horses and kept to their heavy armour. Against the swarms of light Turks and Arabs they won their one victory when the sea was on their flank, but for a march or for a siege inland they were powerless. Richard knew what he was doing when he turned back from Jerusalem as it was just in sight; had he even captured the holy city, he would probably have been cut off and destroyed after the capture. The sole result of the crusade was that a few coast towns and impregnable inland castles held out for another century. Saladin died next year.

In course of time the Mohammedans learnt that it was more to their advantage to allow pilgrims to go to Jerusalem, and that Christian traders would benefit them. The little republic of Venice, once the home of fisherfolk and salt-workers, became the city of merchant princes; she secured the trade of Asia, and particularly that of India which came through the Red Sea or over the desert, and from Venice commerce entered by the old Roman roads and by rivers into the heart of Germany, and finally reached as far as Flanders. This commerce lasted to the sixteenth century. Other crusades followed, but are of little importance in English history.

The last five years of Richard. Leopold of Austria captured Richard as he was making his way home overland from the Adriatic. A ransom of £100,000 was demanded, but he was released when an instalment was paid. He reached England March, 1194. John had conspired against him, and his treachery had to be overlooked. Everybody knows the state of affairs as depicted in Ivanhoe, the vile brother, the selfish barons and mercenaries, the persecuted Jews, the bowmen of Sherwood. Scott has however made too strong a picture of the hatred between Norman and Saxon. Robin Hood may have lived then, yet the ballads connect him with an Edward, not with Richard, he is not mentioned in literature before 1380, and the long-bow was not yet the favourite English weapon. It is clear that the heart of the nation was sound and opposed to John. But the demand for the ransom-money and the taxation for a new war against Philip of France, coming on top of the severe reign of Henry, were producing a new spirit which, when John succeeded, was destined to secure the Great Charter. Even to Richard was money successfully refused on one occasion.

Château Gaillard

Richard fairly held his own against Philip. But he found himself obliged to construct for the defence of Normandy the mighty Château Gaillard, the Saucy Castle. Situated on a high tongue of land falling precipitously to the Seine, with an outer triangle pointing S.E., a rough rectangle towards the N.W., a great interior oval, and within that again a massive keep, while a fortified little town lay below, the new castle argued fear of France. Indeed, under Philip, France was strong beyond all comparison with the resources she had when William I lived. Richard was finally killed at Chaluz in central France, where he had expected to find some treasure. Owing to his long absences he had done little for England. But it would be wrong to sneer at him because he was so little in England. His life's work was to check Saladin and to give to the remaining Christian kingdoms in Palestine another century of existence.

JOHN, 1199—1216

LOSS OF NORMANDY, 1204. BOUVINES, 1214.

THE GREAT CHARTER, 1215.

We always associate together the worst king and the greatest national crisis of England. Lord Macaulay has put it very strongly: "The talents and even the virtues of her first six French kings were a curse to her. The follies and vices of her seventh were her salvation." Such a statement is partly correct, but quite misleading. The previous kings gave to England a firm government, and they kept in check the fierce Norman barons. Now the opposite danger was to be feared, complete royal tyranny; the united barons wrung from John the Charter, which they would have had neither excuse nor opportunity to demand from any predecessor. A greater writer than Macaulay understands our constitution better; it rests, says Edmund Burke, "upon a nice equipoise." The triumph of the barons over John made Parliament possible; king and baronage now balanced each other and kept the ship of state on an even keel. Yet fifty years had to pass before Earl Simon's, and eighty before King Edward's Model Parliament; in 1215 the barons were working for their own profit, not for vague rights and liberties of all classes of unborn Englishmen. Therefore, had their triumph been complete, they would merely have substituted baronial tyranny for royal tyranny, and our knowledge of Stephen's reign tells us what that means.

Another power has to be considered, the People. As the centuries have gone by, this power has helped to maintain the nice equipoise; men have argued "The barons won their rights from John, and why should not we win ours from king and aristocracy combined?"

Philip wins Normandy for France. Every event of John's reign leads up to the Charter. It was, of course, nothing new for the barons to resist a king and his methods of taxation, but each event now seems to help them towards successful resistance. First, John had been chosen in place of Arthur, son of Geoffrey, who was the middle brother between Richard and himself; here was an excuse for Philip to interfere as Arthur's champion. Then he repudiated his wife, offending the barons in England; he married a lady betrothed to a Poitevin noble, offending his barons abroad. When in war he captured Arthur and the boy disappeared, there was more than a suspicion of foul play. Philip invaded Normandy with every chance of success, for the Normans themselves were ready to join him. Château Gaillard was besieged and held out for eight months. John thought it impregnable and made no effort to send relief till too late, constant mining, followed by an assault which starvation had made the garrison too weak to resist, led to its fall. Then all Normandy accepted Philip, as did Maine and Anjou and Poitou: of William I's possessions only the Channel Islands, of Henry II's additions only Gascony remained to the king of England.

The result was that the barons of Norman birth in England had to make a definite choice. Should they cling to their lands in England as subjects of John, or to their lands in Normandy as subjects of Philip? Those who decided for England may be regarded henceforth as the English aristocracy, foreigners indeed by blood, but living in the island and having all their property and interests in the island, in the midst of an Anglo-Saxon peasantry and a middle class of mixed Anglo-Saxon and Norman blood. From 1204 we may speak definitely of an English nation. On the other side France gained under Philip a greater increase of territory than under any previous king, and Normandy was henceforward constantly loyal to France.

Mr John Richard Green writes thus of the fall of Château Gaillard. "From its dark donjon and broken walls we see not merely the pleasant vale of Seine but the sedgy flats of our own Runnymede." The loss of Normandy meant the fall of John's despotic power.

John's defiance of Pope Innocent. Now comes the period of the great struggle in the Church. Innocent III was one of the long line of very powerful popes who, like Hildebrand 150 years earlier, aimed at nothing less than overlordship over the crowned heads of western and central Europe. There was a dispute as to who should be Archbishop of Canterbury. Innocent put aside other candidates and ordered John to receive Stephen Langton. The king refused. The Pope laid England under an interdict, then under the greater excommunication; for the space of some five years no church services were celebrated here. Then Innocent ordered Philip to invade England as the servant of the Church. Suddenly in 1213 John gave way, accepted Stephen Langton, agreed to hold England as a fief of the Roman Papacy, and paid 1000 marks yearly as Rome's vassal. No surrender could be more complete; and it seemed to be clever. The Pope's allies became John's allies; Philip was now ordered to abstain from invasion. England was quite ready for self-defence. Shire-levies were called out, ships from the Cinque Ports destroyed Philip's transports, and won the first national English sea-victory off Danme in Flanders, where the canal from Bruges entered the sea. Even so Harold might have stopped William, and Drake did stop the Armada in 1587, by seeking the enemy on his own coast.

It was in the days of Innocent III that occurred the first attack upon the doctrine of Rome. The earliest reformers, or heretics, were called the Albigensians from the little town of Albi in South France. Innocent, intent on crushing heresy as well as demanding homage from England, declared a crusade and called upon the warriors of France and Normandy. Under Simon de Montfort they soon destroyed the Albigensians.

Great papal alliance against France. Philip must have felt himself in a very undignified position. First ordered by Innocent to fight John, and then suddenly ordered to desist, he became the bitter enemy of the Papacy. John saw his chance, and made common cause with Philip's enemies, the Counts of Flanders and Boulogne who opposed the progress of the power of France, and the Emperor Otto of the House of Brunswick who was his nephew. There was to be a double invasion of France; John would enter Poitou, and his allies would attack from Flanders. But John met with national opposition at home. His barons had been willing to defend England, but refused to serve over the sea. Their argument was this: "Your ancestor William gave lands in England to our ancestors when he was both King of England and Duke of Normandy; you have lost Normandy, and therefore we owe military service to you for England alone." One cannot say that the barons had law on their side; feudal knight-service was a matter of custom, and this question had never come up before. But they were strong enough to win their point and did not serve over the sea. Curiously enough Stephen Langton supported them against John. One would have expected him to support John against them, being now the vassal and obedient servant of Rome. But Langton was an Englishman before he was a priest. He saw that the barons had their chance to defy John when he was so eager to fight Philip. So he produced the charter of Henry I, and called upon them to demand another and stronger charter from John.

John was forced to rely upon mercenaries for his invasion of Poitou and failed completely. His allies of Flanders and Boulogne, Otto and his Germans, and the Earl of Salisbury with English mercenaries, met Philip and a national French army at Bouvines in 1214. The French gained a complete victory. Studied in their history, Bouvines is the first national victory of a new France. Studied in German history, it marks the overthrow of the House of Brunswick and the triumph of Otto's rival for the Empire. But in our eyes it is of chief importance because it marks the last step in John's road to ruin. His attempt to get revenge on Philip and regain Normandy has failed, his mercenaries have been cut to pieces, his allies beaten, and his money spent. He returns to England baffled and conquered. The Great Charter has been won.

Chief clauses of the Great Charter. Signed at Runnymede, June 15, 1215.

1. The Church shall be free, and have its rights and liberties undiminished.

2. Reliefs shall be fixed at £100 for an earl or baron, at £5 for a knight.

3—8. Wards under age, heiresses, and widows of tenants-in-chief, shall be fairly treated.

12. No scutage or aid shall be levied except with the consent of the Common Council of the realm; except the three regular aids, for the redeeming of the king's body, the knighting of his eldest son, and the marrying of his eldest daughter.

13. London and other cities shall enjoy their liberties.

14. The greater prelates and barons shall be summoned to the Council by special writ; lesser tenants-in-chief by general writ addressed to the sheriffs.

39. No free man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseized (= have his property confiscated), outlawed, or exiled, except by legal judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

Runnymede

40. To no man will we sell, deny, or delay justice.

41. All merchants may have security to come and go.

50. Mercenaries shall be dismissed

56—59 Llewelyn of Wales and Alexander of Scotland shall have justice done them.

61. A committee of twenty-five barons shall be appointed to maintain the charter.

62. All ill will, indignation, and rancour have been put away and pardoned.

The first point to be noticed is that we find here very little that is new; Henry I's charter is amplified, the clauses tell in clear language what must be done, but no extravagant new powers, except in clause 61, are demanded by the barons. A great French historian, M. Guizot, says that the Charter is a landmark in our history because it satisfied the old reasonable claims of the barons as against the royal tyranny from William I downwards. Had they forced John to give them something quite new, it would have been valueless. Yet two clauses are new, the 12th and the 61st, in the sense that they contain the seeds of future power; absolute control of the taxation and of the general government of the country is foreshadowed. So M. Guizot makes a second point; the Charter is a landmark because it was confirmed and re-confirmed time after time by Henry III and Edward I. It thus has been the one solid foundation of all the future liberties of the country. Let us vary our metaphor: the English constitution is like a tree; it has its roots in the past, the years before 1215, and it has grown since 1215 by putting out new branches, the solid trunk is the Great Charter.

The barons were only fighting for their own advantage. Almost every clause defines something that the king is to do for them, or promise to them. Yet, they gave an example to other classes. The last half of the 14th clause contains one of the two seeds from which has grown our House of Commons. Charles I's Parliament, when discussing the Petition of Right, referred to and quoted the Great Charter; in fact the two main clauses of the Petition were the 12th and 39th of the Great Charter brought up to date. Therefore the barons were winning, though they knew it not, the liberties of unborn Englishmen of other classes. But at the moment and for the next few centuries the Charter simply strengthened the hands of the barons.

The notice of Llewelyn the Great is important. He had gained very much power as an ally of the barons, and had re-conquered much march land. He was only lord of Snowdon or Prince of North Wales, but he made his power felt over all Wales. Civil war in England helped him in every way.

Danger of a French king of England. The barons were quite united in 1215. Yet the royal power as bequeathed by Henry II was still so great that John instantly set to work to destroy the Charter, and indeed he nearly succeeded. Innocent at once supported him and released him from his oath to observe it. The papal policy was to dictate to the king as a vassal and to get as much as possible out of him, but to allow no one else to dictate to him. John raised new mercenaries that very autumn. The barons in despair applied to Louis, son of Philip of France, and husband of John's niece Blanche. The very thought of a French king over here shocks us. Yet to the men of 1215, whose ancestors had served Saxon and Danish, Norman and Angevin kings, within two centuries, it was hardly shocking. Now such men as Pembroke, who supported John, not as John but as king, stood out as patriots. Soon it was seen that Louis was looking after his own interests, not the liberties of those whom he had been invited to save. John did just the right thing at the right moment. When the worst evils of war were threatening he died at Newark-on-Trent, October 1216. He had lost a part of his army and his treasure in the high tide of the Wash, and was carried off by apoplexy, due to passion and gluttony.

HENRY III, 1216—1272

THE PROVISIONS OF OXFORD, 1258.

SIMON DE MONTFORT'S MODEL PARLIAMENT, 1265.

Relieved of the burden of John's presence, William the Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, could summon round him the patriots. He had been a steady loyalist under Henry II and Richard as well as under John. His wealth and title had come to him through his wife Isabella, Strongbow's daughter; the marshalship came from his father, but he was the first to make the office important. His great merit is that he saved England from Louis. The child Henry III was not responsible for John's misdeeds. So Pembroke was made Regent, and rallied round him the Church as represented by the papal legate and by Stephen Langton, and more earls and barons than might have been expected. He re-issued the Charter, yet without the famous 12th clause.

Expulsion of Louis from England. In 1217 Pembroke attacked and beat Louis in the streets of Lincoln. A pushing and selfish baron, the Earl of Chester, bribed by a grant of the lands of Lancaster, helped Pembroke; so did Falkes de Bréauté, John's leader of mercenaries, chiefly foreign mounted crossbowmen. Meanwhile Hubert de Burgh, who had held Dover for John, with a fleet of forty ships from the Cinque Ports met a French fleet of eighty which were bringing reinforcements to Louis, got the wind behind him, bore down and routed them off Sandwich. Thereupon Louis came to terms and evacuated the country.

Dover Castle; Hubert de Burgh, Constable for John and Henry III

Pembroke died in 1219, his life's work done. He left six sons; each in turn was earl and marshal, each in turn died childless, so that the end of the family was pathetic.

Restoration of the power of the Crown. Hubert de Burgh now held the chief place as Justiciar. He was a strong man and made many enemies, but he followed Pembroke's policy of "England for the English." The various offices of the kingdom, the royal lands and castles which had been handed over by John to his favourites, had to be regained. The Earl of Chester, besides his own earldom and Lancaster, held the castles of Shrewsbury and Bridgnorth, and was sheriff of three counties. Falkes had Oxford, Hertford, and Bedford, and was sheriff of six counties. They had fought well at Lincoln, but could not be allowed to use royal property as their own. In 1224 William de Bréauté, Falkes' brother, laid violent hands at Dunstable on one of the royal judges who had ordered restitution of certain lands, and shut him up in Bedford castle. Hubert made this a test case. He called up all the resources of England, besieged and finally captured the castle by battery and assault. Chester and Falkes were cowed by Hubert's energy and never came to William's relief; Falkes was exiled and died miserably, William was hanged.

The reign of foreign favourites. As Henry grew old enough to rule he gave his confidence to foreigners. Pierre des Roches, Bishop of Winchester, an intruder from Poitou, had always plotted against Hubert. At last he secured his fall. It was a bad beginning for the young king's personal rule that he should have degraded the victor of Sandwich to whom he owed so much.

Henry married Eleanor of Provence, and her relations flocked to England. Her uncle, Boniface of Savoy, became Archbishop of Canterbury; he was not a bad man for the place, and stood up for the Church against both King and Pope, but he was an alien. His mansion on the "strand" of the Thames between London and Westminster is still commemorated by a chapel, a theatre, and an hotel.

John's widow Isabel married her old lover whom John had forced her to renounce, Hugh de la Marche of Poitou. Her sons by this marriage, Henry's half-brothers, came to England. One of them, William de Valence, married a grand-daughter of William the Marshal, and thus obtained the lands of Pembroke.

Henry was almost the slave of the Church. The popes sent many of their favourites to hold valuable livings in England. The barons of England were strong enough to refuse to be taxed for the benefit of Rome. But the clergy at large had to pay very heavily—the whole of their first year's income and a tenth of all their income. A leader in the middle of the reign was Robert Grossetête, Bishop of Lincoln. He was a great scholar, and like Lanfranc and Anselm did much to rouse the clergy in general to a sense of their spiritual duties. He even went so far as to protest against the entrance of foreign priests into his diocese, and he actually obtained from Rome the right to refuse them entrance. It is worth knowing that the diocese of Lincoln was in those days very large and extended from the Humber to the Thames. Grossetête died before the great baronial rising.

It will be seen from what we have said that Henry III was trying to restore to the monarchy the power which it had enjoyed before the Great Charter. It may be indeed said that this was the intermediate reign between the first attack upon the royal absolutism in the person of John and the final acceptance of Parliament by Edward I. It was extremely natural that Henry should try to be a king like his ancestors. But the barons always had the Great Charter to which to look back. They did not intend to submit without protest to violations of it. For instance in 1242, on the occasion of a French war, they refused in the Great Council to grant any money. Later they objected very much to an expedition to Sicily, the crown of which had been given by a pope to Henry's second son, a boy named Edmund. But for many years the barons had no strong leader, for even Grossetête, scholar and patriot as he was, did not unite them.

Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester. Llewelyn the Great had been, it will be remembered, an opponent of John. He died in 1240, leaving behind him a great reputation. His grandson, Llewelyn the Last, carried on the same work and won back considerable lands from the lords marchers. The next reign was fated to see Wales completely and finally conquered, but just now these Princes of North Wales were at their strongest. Randolph of Chester died in 1232, and after an interval the county palatine through lack of an heir was vacant; Henry bestowed it on his son Edward. So here were the future conqueror and conquered, Edward and Llewelyn, face to face for the first time. Llewelyn at this time did much more than hold his own, conquering from Edward all the intermediate lands between Conway and Chester.

New Leaders: Gloucester and Montfort. At last in 1258 some of the stronger earls banded together in opposition. Richard of Clare, Earl of Gloucester and Lord of Glamorgan, was descended from one of William's greatest barons, and may be called the representative of the oldest Norman aristocracy. He held wide lands in many parts of England, particularly in Suffolk, where he had a castle at Clare from which he took his name, in Kent, where was his second castle at Tonbridge, and in Gloucestershire; Clare and Tonbridge had come to him from his grandfather, Gloucester and Glamorgan from his grandmother. For all the lands thus united he owed to the king the feudal service of no less than 450 knights. In contrast to him was Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester. He was the son of the Simon who had made himself famous in France by his crusade against the Albigensian heretics in the days of Innocent III. Therefore he was a foreigner, but he came to England to claim the Earldom of Leicester by right of his grandmother, and the claim was allowed. He was at first popular with neither barons nor king, though he had married the king's sister. At one time he was governor in Gascony, where he added to his unpopularity. Such were the two leaders of the new baronial movement, the one an aristocrat of the bluest blood, the other in the eyes of most Englishmen a new man. But the new man has left his name "writ large" in English history.

Ely; the wooden central octagon built in the 14th century to take the place of the fallen central Norman tower; chancel of much later date than nave

The Mad Parliament at Oxford. Under these leaders were drawn up in 1258 the Provisions of Oxford. This is a document by which the barons demanded nothing less than the supreme control of the government of England, treating the king as a nobody. A council of fifteen barons was to govern the country. Another body of twelve was to meet the fifteen three times a year, and to them the royal officials were to be responsible. It must be remembered that Henry I and Henry II had created a strong class of official barons, the Justiciar and the Chancellor, sheriffs and judges, chiefly from the loyal and lesser baronage, who were responsible to the crown alone. The men who do the work of governing the country are called the "executive." To-day the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, the other ministers, and the heads of the Civil Service, form our executive. In 1258 the most powerful barons forced the king to give up his executive powers to them, and secured for themselves control over the officials. At the same time the foreign favourites and relations of the king were forced to fly the country. But we must notice that their aims were not the same as those of the barons who rebelled against Henry I or Henry II. In those reigns each rebel wished to make himself a petty king on his own estates, and thus to split England into fragments. The barons of 1258 wished to have, not so much feudal power each for himself, but the administration of all England, to be carried on by a committee for the whole baronial body. Also notice how small these two committees were, it was more easy for twelve or fifteen to govern the country than for the whole of the Great Council.

In 1259 the fifteen brought about an important treaty with the king of France, the Treaty of Paris. Henry definitely gave up all Normandy, Anjou, and Poitou, and agreed to do homage for Gascony as a fief of the king of France. It must have been bitter enough for Henry to surrender thus by treaty what his father had lost in war. Also the overlordship of France over Gascony was sure to lead to an attempt by some French king sooner or later to conquer Gascony. But the barons of England did not care whether the king retained this piece of France or not.

The complete triumph of the baronage was not likely to last long. Jealousy broke out at once, and Gloucester quarrelled with Montfort. Probably it was only Gloucester's death that prevented immediate war. Henry now appealed to Rome for permission to break his oath to observe the Provisions of Oxford, and of course Rome granted it. Simon was denounced as a foreigner and worse than those foreigners whom he had helped to expel. He took up arms, and Gilbert, the young Earl of Gloucester who had succeeded his father, joined him and occupied several places along the river Severn. The city of London was in an uproar and mobbed the royal family. In 1264 the king proposed that King Louis should be asked to arbitrate between the royalists and the rebels. The French king decided in favour of a brother king, and annulled the Provisions of Oxford. This award is known as the Mise of Amiens. Simon's party now decided upon open war.

The Barons' War breaks out, 1264. The king had on his side a considerable body of loyal barons, his brother Richard of Cornwall, and his half-brothers of Poitou. With Simon were some of the greater landowners, including Gloucester, a body of infantry from London which has been absurdly exaggerated as 15,000 strong, and some Welsh sent by his ally Llewelyn. The armies met at Lewes in Sussex where the river Ouse has burst its way through the lofty chalk downs to reach the sea; it was just the place for armies to meet, and to-day it is the centre from which the roads and railways of that part of Sussex radiate. Simon's army advanced over the western downs and descended on Lewes, but was split by a dip in the ground into two bodies. Prince Edward on the king's right charged Simon's left and drove it off the field, but it took him a long time to rally after his pursuit. Returning to the battle-ground he found that Simon had taken prisoner the king and many of his followers; next day he himself surrendered.

Earl Simon's Model Parliament, 1265. The result of this decisive victory was to make Simon king in all but name. It was much more the victory of Simon himself than of the baronial body. The king remained in his power and was forced to agree to observe both the Great Charter and the Provisions of Oxford, but Simon really governed. In 1265 he summoned his famous Parliament. Very naturally he only collected his own supporters, not more than five earls and eighteen barons, but a good many churchmen in spite of the pope being always on the king's side. But the peculiar feature which makes this Parliament a second landmark in our history, next to the Great Charter, is that two knights were summoned from each shire and citizens from the Cinque Ports and other cities. Of course Simon had to raise money for the government of the country, and taxation by a rebel, even if a patriotic rebel, was impossible. Wanting money he had to call together those who could promise money. Yet it would be very unfair to insinuate that Simon had no wish to make this a national assembly. The gathering together of barons and bishops, shire members and city members, makes it the forerunner of our present form of Parliament, especially as Edward I had a similar Model Parliament in 1295. Notice how after exactly fifty years the twelfth clause of the Great Charter has been extended. Thus the momentary triumph of Earl Simon practically did more for the nation than any complete party victory of the barons could have done.

Royalist reaction and death of Simon. The old jealousy very soon broke out again. Young Gilbert of Gloucester thought himself much too important a personage to be under Simon's control. Many barons were equally jealous. Another cause of disunion was that Llewelyn the Last was Simon's ally; therefore almost all the lords marchers, who were very much alarmed at the growing power of Llewelyn, joined the king. The Mortimers for instance, whose power was in Shropshire and Herefordshire, were strongly royalist, for they had been driven by Llewelyn from some of their lands. Earl Gilbert had as Lord of Glamorgan this additional reason for breaking with Simon. So it is not at all surprising that a new party for the king grew up. Prince Edward escaped from his guardians and put himself at the head of the party. The campaign which followed centred round the town of Gloucester, for here was the first bridge across the Severn; whoever had access to the town and bridge had access to South Wales. After various manoeuvres Edward overwhelmed Simon's son at Kenilworth, and finally fell upon Simon himself at Evesham on the Warwickshire Avon. The Earl was killed and his army annihilated.

Closing years of Henry's reign. At first the royalists were inclined to be revengeful. But warned by various new risings, threatened both by Llewelyn and by Earl Gilbert, who held the balance of power between the two parties and who even marched upon London where the citizens welcomed him as they had in 1264 welcomed Simon, Prince Edward finally made an arrangement in 1267. There was to be a general peace and no sweeping confiscation of the lands of rebels. But to this there was an exception. Henry's second son Edmund received Simon's lands and earldom of Leicester, the lands and earldom of Derby, Lancaster, which from Randolph of Chester had passed to the Earl of Derby, and Monmouth and other castles in S E Wales. Thus was founded the House of Lancaster. As Edmund's descendants invariably managed to marry heiresses, the family amassed enormous wealth. A century later Edmund's great-grand-daughter Blanche married her cousin John of Gaunt, and they were the parents of Henry IV, the first Lancastrian king. Under Edmund Lancaster became a county palatine. You will remember that Chester, which had been a county palatine since the reign of William I, had come into the hands of Prince Edward.

In 1267 a treaty was made with Llewelyn whose power was too great to be disregarded. He was acknowledged as Prince of Wales, and was allowed to keep much of the march lands almost up to the gates of Chester and Shrewsbury.

In 1270 Prince Edward started on a crusade and was still absent when his father died. Henry III's long reign of fifty-six years came to an end in 1272. It forms the link between the Great Charter and the parliamentary system of Edward I. Even the defeat of Simon could not restore to the crown the power it had in Henry II's reign.

The growth of learning in England. In the twelfth century England began to profit, by the connection with Europe which her Norman and Angevin kings gave her, in educational and religious matters. We have already talked about the monasteries; in many of these, especially in the larger towns, boys were taught and brought up to be priests. Oxford particularly attracted students, and Gerald Barry, the Norman-Welsh historian of Henry II's reign, was struck by their numbers. Oxford on the chief ford of the upper Thames, and Cambridge in the gap between fen and forest, surpassed other towns where there were schools. The best centre of learning in western Europe was Paris, and thither flocked many young Englishmen. But by Henry III's reign the fame of Oxford had grown so high that it almost rivalled Paris. Students came to learn from special teachers; there was no organization of classes, nor any fine colleges or halls. They were often noisy and quarrelsome, keen politicians, sometimes ready to mob a papal legate, sometimes to support such a leader as Earl Simon, or else to fight each other, Yorkshiremen, for example, against Kentishmen. But rowdiness was, after all, only the outcome of youthful high spirits in a crowded town. The benefit to the nation was that foreigners and Englishmen, northerners and southerners, met and studied together at Oxford.

Salisbury

Triforium in Angel Choir, Lincoln Cathedral

At one time the Church feared that learning might lead to heresy; you will remember how Pope Innocent III destroyed the Albigensian heretics in the south of France when John was our king. Then Dominic, a Spaniard, founded the Order of the Black Friars to help the Church. They were "brothers," bound to strict poverty and to beg their daily bread, and were thus known as Mendicants. Francis of Assisi founded the Grey Friars. Both Orders came to England. They settled in the slums of towns to help their fellow-men; they did not live permanently in their convents, as the monks did, but went out to teach and preach. The Franciscans came to Oxford and got most of the teaching into their hands. Robert Grossetête, before he became a bishop and politician, was lecturer to Franciscan students at Oxford. The aim of the Church was to win over the young and clever. Yet the most celebrated of Oxford's sons, Friar Roger Bacon, was accused of heresy and was imprisoned; he was the first man of science in England, and science seemed to be anti-religious because its home was in Spain among the Mohammedans, the Saracens and Moors of Cordova and Granada. In general, in spite of the feebleness of the king, his foreign favourites, and civil war, this reign is noticeable for real progress in learning and serious things.

What, for instance, can be more wonderful than the rebuilding of Westminster Abbey by Henry III? Parliament was born in his reign against his will; yet the national Abbey which we owe to him stands in front of our present Parliament House as the chief memorial of his reign.

though indeed it was not finished till very many reigns had gone by. A new style of architecture came in. Lighter yet stronger pillars with high-pitched pointed arches, so as to carry the weight of the roof more easily, graceful lancet windows, and a general sense of more light and air, are the marks inside such a church of the Early English period of Gothic architecture; graceful spires or towers, and flying buttresses which support the walls, gradually superseded the heavy Norman work and made the outside more beautiful. Westminster, indeed, has no central tower or spire, but the cathedral of Lincoln has a grand tower. The bishop and clergy of Old Sarum deserted their position on a hill, where was their old cathedral within an old pre-Roman camp, and built a new cathedral two miles off on the bank of a river at New Sarum or Salisbury; the work went on for about a century, and the splendid spire was added last. Both Old Sarum and New Sarum sent members to Parliament.

EDWARD I, 1272—1307

FIRST WELSH WAR, 1277.

SECOND WELSH WAR, 1282—3.

FRENCH WAR AND LAST WELSH WAR, 1294.

MODEL PARLIAMENT, 1295.

FIRST INVASION OF SCOTLAND, 1296.

WALLACE'S VICTORY AT STIRLING, AND CONFIRMATIO
CARTARUM, 1297.

FALKIRK, 1298.

FINAL CONFIRMATION AT LINCOLN, 1301.

Edward was still crusading when his father died. His claim to the crown was acknowledged, and his reign was dated from Henry's death, though he was not crowned till two years later. He was already married to Eleanor of Castile, a noble-minded lady, whose memory is preserved in the Eleanor Crosses erected at the various places where her funeral procession halted on the way from Lincoln to Westminster in 1290. Some of these crosses can be seen to-day, as at Northampton and Waltham.

King and Parliament. Some writers give all the credit to Simon de Montfort as the father of our parliamentary system, others to Edward I. Each should be honoured according to the circumstances in which he lived. Simon made Parliament possible, Edward made it permanent. Henry II as law-giver had imposed his will on the nation by issuing royal edicts, the Assize of Arms, the Great Assize, and others; Simon expanded the 12th clause of the Great Charter, and developed the Great Council into Parliament, which became the tax-voting body; Edward utilized Parliament and converted the tax-voting machine to be also the law-making machine. Thus, he who as prince had crushed the rebel Simon, as king continued and amplified the rebel's work.

In places of Assizes we now have Statutes, which were passed by the king on the advice of his prelates and barons and with the consent of his Commons; we call them to-day Acts of Parliament. Edward summoned many parliaments, of different types and kinds and at irregular intervals, until at last in 1295 he had the Model Parliament in which "what concerned all should be approved by all," not only taxation but the general foreign policy of the kingdom as well.

Under Edward II the Commons claimed to have a voice in law making; mere consent was not enough, and they were raised to absolute equality with the prelates and barons. The inferior clergy dropped out and taxed themselves in their own House of Convocation. At least as early as Edward III the prelates—who by right of their lands as tenants-in-chief were also barons—and the barons were definitely separated from the Commons, and so we have two Houses of Parliament. The Commons claimed their right to attack and impeach the king's ministers. The next step was for the Commons to gain sole control of taxation. Parliament is thus strong because of its gradual growth and development.

Next we have the question of place and duration. Edward I summoned Parliament to any place that was convenient, Gloucester, Winchester, Lincoln, York. Gradually it was found that a fixed centre, Westminster, was best. It sat at irregular intervals, and on each new summons there was a new election. Henry VIII, having got a subservient Parliament, did not dissolve it, but prorogued it; there were several sessions without new elections. Under William III annual sessions were necessary, and elections were, by the Triennial Act, to be held at least at the end of every three years; under George I by the Septennial Act at the end of every seven.

The form of Parliament has been very little changed; only the inferior clergy, and at the Reformation the abbots, have dropped out. Peers are still created by the king, by what are known as letters patent, and they are summoned to Parliament by the king's writ. Under Henry VI only landowners who held freely property worth £2 might vote for the election of knights of the shire, i.e. county members. The Tudors called upon several new towns and even villages to send members to the Commons. It was not till 1832 that representation according to population was accepted as the general principle in the distribution of seats; then big cities which had grown up since the days of Edward I or the Tudors acquired the right to elect members, and small decayed towns and villages lost their members. Twice since then there has been a succession of reforms of Parliament which has worked towards equalising the districts returning members. Wales and Chester first sent members to Parliament under Henry VIII, Durham under Charles II, Scotland under Anne in 1707, Ireland under George III in 1800.

King and the Royal Prerogative. Most English writers regard Edward I as our greatest and most beneficent king. As a man he was handsome and generous, athletic and a clever warrior. Yet naturally in the eyes of Welshmen and Scotsmen his faults loom large; to them he is the "ruthless king," underhand and vindictive; he is sneered at as "Longshanks." Even some English writers accuse him of being tricky, especially in his dealings with his barons; though he insisted that promises should be kept, he kept them in the letter rather than in the spirit. Let us look into this.

Firstly, he was honestly desirous to work well with his barons so as to make Parliament a success. His wish was to act up to the words he used in his summons to the Model Parliament: "what concerns all should be approved by all"; yet two years later he was seizing money and wool without consent of Parliament. Then arose the cry "Magna Carta in danger"; he appeared to be every bit as bad as John, and was called upon to confirm the Charter, for four years he haggled and was accused of trickiness. Of course it is difficult to calculate his motives. But this is clear; he saw that the complete triumph of Parliament would be a complete triumph for the baronage only, and therefore be bad for the nation; so he stood out for the right of the king to be "above both custom and law" for the good of the nation in critical times. This is the Royal Prerogative. Crown and aristocracy must work together each in its proper place to trim the ship of state, to preserve the "nice equipoise" of which Burke was to write in George III's reign. As the barons must not be allowed to have everything their own way, the king must stand upon his rights strictly. Thus the men who opposed him in 1297 thought him tricky and tyrannical; he thought them unpatriotic. He was bitterly revengeful on the archbishop and earl who were his most active opponents. Yet he had to give way in the long run. The result was that in the reign of his weak and selfish son the barons triumphed with disastrous results.

He conquered Wales and tried to conquer Scotland. It is easy to cry out about "methods of barbarism" when discussing any conqueror. But one must bear in mind the ideas of those days. He certainly thought that his claim to the overlordship of Scotland was fair; he had been accepted after Balliol's deposition by the whole of the aristocracy of Scotland. David of Wales was a double traitor, first to his own brother Llewelyn, and, when he could not get all he wanted out of Edward, then to Edward in turn. Wallace of Scotland was the brutal devastator of Cumberland. Hence the horrible punishment of each by hanging and quartering. Besides he naturally had to bear the blame of the petty tyrannies of his servants, though, as he said once on an outbreak, "Why rebel instead of appealing to me against such tyrannies?" He stood upon what he thought were his legal rights as overlord of Wales and Scotland; he never understood the feeling of national independence, for he looked upon national liberty to be mere love of lawlessness.

The Statutes of the reign. We begin with the first Statute of Westminster which settled various details of government. At the same time was voted an export tax on the wool and hides going to Flanders; this was the "good custom," and brought in a large sum. At intervals when there was war a property-tax was voted, a thirtieth or a fifteenth as the case might be. Scutage was only sanctioned five times during the reign, and brought in very little money because most barons served in person.

Early in the reign Edward sent round officials to ask on what warrant, quo warranto, each baron or landowner held his manors. The Earl of Surrey produced as his warrant the rusty sword of his ancestors, a silly and false piece of brag, yet Edward passed it by. The king clearly had the right to know by what charter or royal grant lands had been awarded; the Statute of Gloucester acknowledged this right.

The second and third Statutes of Westminster decided, amongst other things, that land was not the private property of the holder, and could not be got rid of so as to harm the heir. Also the clause known as Quia Emptores provided that if A was overlord, and his sub-tenant B sold or granted some land to C, then A should have the right to the same services from C that he had had from B; to put it differently, if A as overlord has eight soldiers due from B, and if B grants a quarter of the land to C, then C shall send two soldiers to serve A.

The Statute of Mortmain provided that land should not be bestowed upon the Church without the king's consent. If an abbey or other ecclesiastical body held land, it was said to be held "in the dead hand," as it could not pass to an heir; whereas when a baron died, his heir had to pay a "relief" to the king before he could take his inheritance.

The Statute of Winchester made many regulations for the peace and security of the country, for the safety of towns, for the calling-out of the men of the county when the sheriff raised the "hue and cry" after criminals and rioters, and for the muster and inspection of the county forces with arms and armour according to each man's wealth. It was the Assize of Arms of Henry II brought up to date. At the same time Edward demanded that all whose property was above a certain value should be knighted and ready to serve in his wars; yet when they served he paid them.

This is a long string of laws to remember; but the important thing is to see that here we have a reign of law-making.

The first Welsh war. Llewelyn the Last, like his grandfather, had profited much by civil war in England. He had re-conquered a great deal of land, refused to do homage, and was going to marry Simon's daughter; to Edward this seemed to mean the creation of a new Montfortian party in England. War was sanctioned by the barons in 1277, and all of them, whether old Montfortians or royalists, served in it. A forty days' limit to feudal service, as can be easily seen, was absurd. So Edward asked for smaller numbers of horsemen than a baron was bound by his tenure to bring; Gilbert, Earl of Gloucester, in place of the 450 horsemen such as his ancestors owed to William I, brought 10 dubbed knights, making up, with attendant men-at-arms, a squadron of 40 or 50 lances, and served for the whole war. Less important barons took the king's pay before and after the forty days of unpaid service. The choicest infantry were crossbowmen, but only 300 in number. Other infantry were drawn from counties bordering on Wales, Chester which was in Edward's own hands, Lancaster which was in his brother Edmund's, Shropshire and Herefordshire; also from the marches of south and central Wales. Thus Edward was conquering North Wales with the help of the South Welsh, who, as in the days of Strongbow, were the best archers. Englishmen gradually learnt genuine long-bow archery from their allies in these wars. Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire, though not touching Wales, provided archers, as indeed might be expected from the home of Robin Hood. The whole army mustered about 1000 mailed horse, 6000 English, and 9000 South Welsh foot, of whom perhaps half had bows. Yet they did not all serve for the full five months, and they were broken up into many detachments.

Edwardian tower and gateway added to Chepstow Castle

Edward marched from Chester and cut a wide track through the forests along the coast to the mouth of the Conway river. A small fleet came round from the Cinque Ports, and took a division over to Anglesey in Llewelyn's rear. Caught thus between two armies the Prince came to terms. He surrendered all the land between the Conway and Chester, and whatever he had conquered in the south and centre; he retained his own principality of Snowdonia or Gwynedd, and did homage. Edward at once built a new castle and harbour at Rhuddlan, three miles up the river Clwyd; also castles at Flint, Aberystwith, and Builth on the upper Wye. About the same time the Earl of Gloucester was building an enormous fortress at Caerphilly in Glamorgan, and the Earl of Norfolk was adding to Strongbow's castle at Chepstow.

The second Welsh war. A new war was sure to come. It was hastened by Llewelyn's brother David, who had been Edward's ally and thought himself insufficiently rewarded. In March 1282 he suddenly seized Hawarden castle. The Welsh fought desperately for fifteen months, and both David and Llewelyn burst into South Wales to incite their countrymen of the marches to revolt. It was not till October that Edward, advancing from his base at Rhuddlan, reached the Conway. A corps was again sent to Anglesey, but, when it crossed at low tide to the mainland at Aber, Llewelyn dashed upon it and cut it to pieces. Edward fell back to Rhuddlan and summoned reinforcements for a winter campaign; some 1500 of his war-loving subjects, the Gascons, arrived, all of them crossbowmen whether horse or foot. Soon the English got the upper hand. Llewelyn went to organize a revolt on the Wye, and was beaten and slain near Builth in December; there is a constant tradition that he was betrayed, though who were the actual "traitors of Builth" does not appear. David had not the same gift of leadership. English and Gascons in many small bodies penetrated into Snowdonia, and David was captured in June, 1283. The country was finally annexed.

Castles now arose at Conway, Caernarvon, and Harlech. Caernarvon was the official capital; here was installed the Justiciar of North Wales; here Prince Edward was born, but he was not made Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester till many years later. Round each castle grew up a little

Builth Castle as rebuilt by Edward I on an old mound-and-court site, restored from description in documents town of English settlers. The annexed country was divided into shires, Anglesey, Caernarvonshire, and Merioneth; Cardiganshire and Caermarthenshire had been formed in 1277. Yet they did not send members to Parliament. English rule does not seem to have been tyrannical, the story of Edward's massacre of the bards has long ago been acknowledged to be a myth, but of course it did not suit Welsh minds, and feelings of bitterness lasted long.

March privileges and customs. The lords marchers claimed the right to do what they pleased on their own march lands, a claim dating in some cases from the days of Rufus. Many an English earl valued his march privileges even more than his earldom, because of such freedom. Edward clearly meant to put an end to their rights and

Conway Castle, built by Edward I introduce a reign of law; they resented it greatly, for they had all fought against Llewelyn and saw with dismay that they were going to suffer for it. In particular he objected to their custom of waging war upon each other at their own pleasure, a thing which no king would allow in England. Gilbert of Clare, Earl of Gloucester and Lord of Glamorgan, attacked Humphrey of Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Lord of Brecknock. Edward ordered him again and again to desist, and each time he disobeyed. Strong measures were necessary, and finally Edward imprisoned both earls, stripped them of their march lands, and restored them only after heavy fines had been inflicted. Gilbert died shortly, a sadder and a wiser man. Humphrey lived to get his revenge upon his king; and indeed he seems to have been harshly treated, for it was Gilbert who had been originally in the wrong. The other lords marchers sympathized. The whole story is of importance because a few years later in 1297 there was personal bitterness at the root of the barons' defiance of Edward.

The middle years of Edward's reign show a good deal of disorderliness and his intention to stop it. He brought down his hand very heavily upon the judges whom he found to be guilty of taking bribes and perverting justice. He expelled the Jews in 1290, from Gascony as well as from England. This was a very popular act. The Jews were hated for their wealth and their exclusiveness, for they were a colony of aliens enriching themselves at the expense of the natives; all sorts of scandalous stories were circulated, especially that they sacrificed Christian children. Usury, or the practice of asking interest on loans, was hated in the middle ages and condemned by the Church. To take the place of the Jews as money-lenders Edward favoured Italian merchants and bankers. He did not pay them interest on their loans, but gave them trade-privileges. Genoa, Lucca, Pisa, and Florence, were the chief merchant cities for west Europe; Venice was the great trading centre between Asia and central Europe.

The Balliol-Bruce controversy¹. Next the Scottish question confronts us. King Alexander III died in 1286; his heiress and grand-daughter, the Maid of Norway, died in 1290, and the direct line was extinct. The younger brother of William the Lion of Henry II's reign was David of Huntingdon; his eldest daughter's daughter had married a Balliol, his second daughter a Bruce, and the third a

¹ See p 148

Hastings; all these were English barons of Norman blood. John Balliol therefore claimed the throne of Scotland through two women, his mother and grandmother; Robert Bruce through one woman, his mother, but she had been younger than Balliol's grandmother. The lands of Huntingdon, an English barony, had been equally divided between the three families. Bruce and Hastings wished to divide Scotland similarly, Balliol alone held out to keep Scotland one. There were other competitors with weak claims. Edward was asked to arbitrate. In former days the Saxon Edward the Elder, the Dane Canute, the Norman William, had in turn received homage of a vague kind from Scotland; all homage for Huntingdon was of course paid as for an English barony. Henry II had indeed received very definite homage from William the Lion by the Treaty of Falaise in 1175, but this had been extorted from a prisoner who had no right to pledge his successors to be vassals, in any case Richard I had sold this overlordship when he went crusading. Now Edward I consented to arbitrate on condition that he should be regarded as overlord. He went up to Norham, a celebrated castle belonging to the Bishop of Durham on the English bank of the Tweed, at the first ford as you go upstream from Berwick. He arbitrated with fairness, refused to split Scotland into three, and gave the crown to Balliol, who did homage unconditionally as his vassal.

War in France, Wales, and Scotland. Troubles now came fast upon Edward. They rose first in France. He was vassal of the king of France for Gascony; just as he insisted on his rights over Scotland, so he had to submit to the Frenchman's rights over Gascony. Philip IV was as ambitious to secure this province as Philip II had been to get Normandy and Anjou. A pretext came when the sailors of our south coast and of the French north coast, independent and masterful fellows who did not at all care whether their kings were at war or at peace, fought each other. Philip summoned Edward as his vassal to Paris to account for the conduct of his sailors, and Edward sent his brother, Edmund of Lancaster, who was tricked into surrendering temporarily some places in Gascony; Philip having got them kept them, and the result was war.

As Balliol was Edward's vassal, the Scottish barons and vassals found that they could appeal against him to Edward as overlord. By this Balliol was goaded into defiance. Thus naturally was formed an alliance between Scotland and France, which lasted down to the days of Mary Stuart and John Knox.

Hard pressed to find soldiers to send to Gascony, for the English cared not whether he held any lands across the sea, Edward impressed Welshmen. As soon as the Welsh had arms in their hands they turned against him, seized Caernarvon, and besieged Harlech and Bulth and other castles.

The events of the next half-dozen years require careful study. Not only had Edward three wars on hand; he had to face the opposition of barons at home. They were willing to fight the Welsh, but put pressure on the king to redress their grievances before they would help him against France or Scotland.

The last Welsh war, 1294. Edward had the somewhat rare power of being able to concentrate his attention upon one thing at a time. He cancelled the orders for troops to go to Gascony, and sent them at once into Wales. He himself in the winter was blockaded in Conway castle. The main English army came up in January 1295, and won a complete victory; the Welsh spearmen resisted successfully the charges of mailed horsemen, but were shot down by the archers, for the long-bow had been growing in favour with Englishmen during the previous Welsh wars. After eight months Edward crushed the revolt; Beaumaris castle was erected in Anglesey to control the Menai straits, and Caernarvon was repaired and strengthened. During the rest of the year Edward was chiefly occupied with naval defence against the French.

The Model Parliament. 1295. Under these conditions, one war finished and two remaining to be faced, he summoned this ever memorable Parliament. His words cannot be too often repeated: "What concerns all should be approved by all, and common dangers should be met by resistance in common." He not only wished to receive money grants, but to bring all orders to regard the war as a national undertaking. He summoned (1) Earls and greater barons by special writ; (2) Archbishops, bishops, important abbots, cathedral clergy, with representatives of the parish clergy; (3) Knights of the shire and burgesses from considerable towns. The three "estates" met separately, and taxed their own "orders" separately.

The first Scotch war, 1296. Now came the turn of Scotland. The English invaded by the coast route from Berwick towards Edinburgh, and their van easily beat Balliol at Dunbar. He was deposed, kept for a time in the Tower, and then allowed to retire to France, so he passed out of history, leaving behind him a legacy of national alliance with France. The annexation of Wales probably suggested to Edward that annexation would best suit Scotland also. He declared the crown forfeit to him as overlord. He carried off from the palace of Scone near Perth "the stone of destiny," on which Scottish kings had been crowned, it is still in Westminster Abbey and played its part in the coronation of His Majesty George V. He received at Berwick the submission of all the Scottish nobles and other men of position, whose names were entered on a document called Ragman Roll. There seemed to be nothing more to be done. Yet Edward's policy was unwise. A policy of annexation is seldom effective, unless, as in the case of Wales, it comes at the end of long years of gradual conquest and gradual subjection of march lands. The sudden introduction of English ideas into Scotland, and the behaviour of English captains on what they thought to be conquered territory, were sure to produce risings. Warlike races, especially if freedom means freedom to fight and raid, cannot sit still.

The crisis of 1297: "Go or hang." The French war remained. Edward had made alliance with the Flemings and wanted more money for a campaign from Flanders. Suddenly opposition arose from the clergy. Robert of Winchelsea, Archbishop of Canterbury, produced a bull from Pope Boniface which forbade the clergy to pay any taxes without papal consent. The quarrel was hot. Edward outlawed the clergy, and helped himself to church property; if churchmen refused to aid the government, they should not have the benefit of the law of the land. It was intolerable that a king should be prevented at the bidding of Rome from raising money for a national war.

Next two earls took up the defiance. Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, and hereditary Constable, had been nursing his grievances since his imprisonment. Roger Bigot, Earl of Norfolk and Marshal—he held this office by right of his grandmother, eldest daughter of William the Marshal, from whom also he had inherited Chepstow—had also a cause for personal bitterness against Edward. Gilbert of Gloucester was dead, or he too would doubtless have joined to form a triumvirate of defiance. First they refused to sail to Gascony while the king himself went to Flanders; their office could be performed only in the king's presence. He declared that they should go or hang; they retorted that they would neither go nor hang; nor did they. Neither would they go to Flanders as a feudal duty. King John had been unable to compel his barons to serve over the sea, for the loss of Normandy had cancelled his right to compel. Evidently the two earls had a powerful silent backing; had they alone defied Edward, they would soon have been crushed.

“Confirm the Charters.” News came from Scotland that an obscure knight, William “le Waleys”—it matters little whether he was really of Welsh descent, or was called “Welsh” because he belonged to the Gaelic part of Scotland—had risen in arms. Edward made light of it and continued his preparations for war in Flanders. He requisitioned supplies, and seized the merchants’ wool, though he promised to pay on his return. He defended himself against charges of tyranny; he had fairly met his Parliaments and made his appeal for aid from the nation; if unpatriotic and selfish men thwarted him in a policy of war which would benefit the nation, he must stand on his royal rights for the national good. Hereford and Norfolk raised the cry of “Magna Carta in danger,” and demanded that he should “Confirm the Charters¹.” But he sailed to Flanders, considering it less risky to leave the earls behind than to disappoint his allies. He took with him barely 800 horse and a few thousand foot, mostly impressed Welshmen; both horse and foot were paid. Prince Edward was regent in his absence, with a veteran soldier Lord Grey as his chief adviser.

Wallace saves England from civil war. That autumn Prince Edward summoned a Parliament, and called armed men to London. Hereford and Norfolk were also arming. Would there be civil war? It certainly seemed to be within measurable distance. Like a thunderbolt came the news that Wallace had fallen upon and routed an English force at Stirling Bridge, September 11; attacking it at the moment when one half of it had crossed and was separated from the other by the river Forth. With the king in Flanders, with both loyalists and rebels arming in England, there cannot have been a large army in Scotland for Wallace to defeat; but the results were tremendous. The English fell into a panic; Wallace captured several castles and brought over waverers, he was made "guardian" of Scotland for the absent Balliol, and so his rising became a national war. But perhaps the chief result was that civil war was averted in England. Prince Edward and Grey gave way, and the Charters were confirmed. Loyalists and rebels patched up a truce and hastened north to save Berwick. Edward, while yet in Flanders, himself also confirmed the Charters.

¹ “Charters,” because they called on him to confirm, not John’s Charter only, but also the Charter of the Forests, this was a document by which the severe forest laws had been modified

The campaign of Falkirk, 1298. Edward had done very little good in Flanders; in fact his Welsh infantry had chiefly distinguished itself by plundering his own allies. He returned early in the year, and summoned a new army for Scotland. His mailed horse, including some Gascons, mustered about 2500 strong, half doing unpaid feudal service, half paid; 12,500 foot were summoned, entirely from Wales and the marches, and Lancaster and Chester, for he obviously preferred to trust his experienced soldiers and even his enemies of the Welsh wars rather than the inexperienced northerners. But, before they would consent to march, Hereford and Norfolk demanded a third Confirmation. Last year the Prince had confirmed in England and the King in Flanders; now they demanded that the King should confirm in person and in England. He refused; he meant to keep his promise, and was not going to have his royal word doubted. They held firm, for they saw their opportunity in his anxiety to fight Wallace. So there was a deadlock. At last the loyal barons pledged their word that he would keep faith, and then Hereford and Norfolk joined the army.

The English and Welsh army came up with Wallace at Falkirk, not far from Stirling, July 22. Having few archers and fewer horse, for the nobles of Scotland had not joined him, Wallace drew up his foot spearmen in four great rings, "schiltrons" or shield-walls. Like the Welsh near Conway in 1295, he at first easily beat off the English horse; but the archers riddled the schiltrons at long range, the horse charged again and scattered the Scots. Yet little result came from the victory. Hereford and Norfolk insisted winter campaign. Wallace fled to France. Notice two striking figures on the English side; Antony Bek, the warrior-bishop of Durham, and Robert Bruce, grandson of Bruce the competitor and future king, who, having refused to support Wallace as the guardian for John Balliol, was in Edward's service at this date, and perhaps, though not certainly, was at Falkirk.

The "Conquest" of Scotland, 1303. Hereford died, but Norfolk had still supporters enough to mar the campaign. In spite of Falkirk the Scots were strong enough even to capture Stirling. There was an invasion in 1300 which again lasted only forty days, and one solitary castle, Caerlaverock, was captured by the English. Edward at last had to give way. He had held out against the suspicion that he would break his faith because he had confirmed the charters while abroad; he offered to confirm again with the words added "Salvo jure coronae"—saving the right of the crown to be above the law. Nothing would satisfy the barons. So at Lincoln in 1301 he fully and unconditionally confirmed; this was the final Confirmatio Cartarum. In 1303 he invaded Scotland and remained there, not for a paltry forty days, but for close on two years. He recaptured Stirling, caught and executed Wallace, and imagined that Scotland was really and finally conquered. Yet while he held himself to be legally justified, as Balliol's overlord, in undertaking the conquest, he failed even yet to perceive that he had roused a national resistance that cared nothing for such legality. Wallace's work lived after his death in the temper of the Scots.

As regards Philip IV of France Edward's troubles were partly removed by the arbitration of Pope Boniface between the two kings. Shortly afterwards Philip withdrew his garrisons from Gascony, and now there was no cause for war between England and France.

Archbishop Winchelsea had been Edward's bitter opponent, but he lost all his supporters and even Pope Boniface no longer backed him. Edward exiled him with stern words of condemnation for his unpatriotic pride. Antony Bek, who had been loyal and contumacious in turn, was stripped of his power. But the heaviest vengeance fell upon Norfolk, earldom, marshalship, and lands, were given up and restored upon humiliating terms. The moral of all this is clear. As soon as ever Edward brought himself to confirm the charters finally, opposition disappeared and he was able to punish the ringleaders. But, after all, the power of the crown was fatally weakened, and the nice equipoise was lost, for in future reigns when barons wished to put pressure on a king they need only threaten to thwart his war policy.

The rising of Robert Bruce. The grandson of Bruce the competitor has been already mentioned. He had several times pledged and broken his faith to Edward, and he at last made his final choice. The execution of Wallace meant that nobody now stood up for Balliol, and Bruce put forward his own claim. He murdered another claimant, the Red Comyn, who was Balliol's nephew. Edward was on his way to fight him in 1307; but his health was already bad, and he died in Cumberland at Burgh-on-Sands.

A NOTE ON WAR.

Under Edward I the English first began to show an instinct for fighting. For a couple of centuries after Hastings, whenever there is war, it is the Norman aristocracy that fights with its armed retainers, while the Anglo-Saxon population farms and looks on; Tinchebrai and Northallerton are isolated affairs. Under Edward I the counties near Wales become warlike, under Edward II and Edward III the northern counties learn the art of war in self-defence against the Scots, and finally in France victory and plunder make the whole race pugnacious. War brings out national character. The Anglo-Saxon is slow to begin, but put him with his back to the wall and make him fight, then his doggedness is shown. He requires leading. When Angevin kings and Norman nobles lead an infantry of mixed Anglo-Saxon-Norman blood, then we have the national English armies winning victories in France.

Armour as worn at the end of Edward I's reign

Cavalry. At Hastings we find in use mail-shirts, open helmets, swords, and short lances. During the Crusades the chain mail is worn from head to toe with a great barred helm, the lances are longer and thicker, and the horse is armoured; therefore cavalry are much more clumsy. At Bouvines, at Lewes and Evesham, the foot are worthless. Horse and foot are combined at Buth, Conway, and Falkirk. But not till after the set-back at Bannockburn do the mounted men learn to combine effectively with the archers. Then we trace, through Boroughbridge and Halidon Hill to Crecy, how from defeat the English learnt the way to conquer, dismounted knights fighting with hollow wedges of archers intermixed.

Archery. The short bow at Hastings was only pulled to the chest. The long bow was used in South Wales in the days of Strongbow, and came to be the favourite English weapon under the three Edwards; the archer stood sideways to his mark, drew to a level with his ear a 30 or 33 inch arrow, aimed and put on his weight and strength at the same moment. Try the two attitudes; in the short pull you only use the weak fore-arm, in the long pull both biceps and back. Rapid shooting was essential. The cross-bow invented during the Crusades became the weapon of mercenaries, Gascons and Genoese, but it was clumsy to load; the steel cross-bow, however, was very powerful. But the yew long-bow was the weapon for sturdy well-fed peasants, simple, strong, elastic, difficult to master, but deadly when once fairly mastered.

The Schiltron. The pike, a long shaft with pointed iron head, is the weapon for brave men who have not been professionally trained to war. The Welsh and Scots used it against the English, the Flemish against the French, and the Swiss against the Austrians. There is no need to argue that one nation copied another in using it. Pikemen standing firm, shoulder to shoulder, cannot be broken by a direct charge of horse. But they are powerless against arrows, or against a flank attack.

Castles. The "Edwardian" style of castle-architecture was copied from the east, and came into vogue somewhat before Edward I's reign. Conway and Caernarvon are great oval fortresses having enormously thick and high single walls with towers in them at intervals. Rhuddlan, Beaumaris, Harlech, Caerphilly, Kidwelly, all in Wales, are on a rival plan, a lofty hollow square within a lower square. Other and older castles, such as Chepstow and Corfe, have Edwardian additions, thick stone outworks spreading downhill from the Norman keep on the top. The mortar was so strong that it is to-day as hard as the stone.

Pevensey: inner castle of Henry II in a corner of the Roman walls Scale of pay. Daily wages and "find your own food and equipment." Reign of Edward I.

Unskilled labourer	2d.	Ordinary foot
Ordinary workman	3d.	Sailor
Superior workman	4d.	Cross-bowman. Corporal of foot
Mason and carpenter	6d.	Light horse. Ship-master
Foreman of masons	1s.	Mailed horse. Fleet captain
Architect	2s.	Knight. Admiral
King's chief architect	3s.	Knight of the King's household
	4s.	Baron. Knight-banneret

Notice that the workman is better paid than the soldier. Probably very little of his 2d. reached the latter after deduction for food, and he must have expected to make money by loot. Both workman and soldier were liable to be pressed for the king's service, if not enough men were forthcoming voluntarily; desertion was common.

There was a rise of pay under Edward III; Archer 3d.; Horse-archer 6d.; Earl or Bishop (Crecy) 6s. 8d.; Black Prince £1. The Black Death doubled pay for some years.

Map of Cinque Ports

But at Agincourt the Crecy scale was resumed, except that the king's brothers received 13s. 4d.

Horses. These were heavy hard-mouthed brutes of the cart-horse breed, but capable of carrying weight. Best Spanish horses for the king and richest nobles cost £40 to £100; an average price for a knight's horse was £15, for a common troop horse £8. Lists were made of every horse in the king's pay, with colour, points, and value; e.g. "The Earl of Warwick has one black horse with one white foot and a star in the forehead, price £60." Thus we have very full information. Multiply by 12 or 15 for money of to-day. It will be at once seen that an army of 40,000 cavalry was impossible in the middle ages.

The Navy. Of course the mariners, fishermen, and traders cannot be accused of the supine love of rustic comfort which we find in the peasants. Life in a coast-town sharpens the wits. The Cinque Ports received privileges in self-government under the Norman kings; in return they had to find ships without pay for 15 days in the year for the king's service. The original five were Sandwich, Dover, Hythe, Romney, Hastings. Winchelsea and Rye were next added, then "daughter ports" in Kent and Sussex, till they numbered thirty. They were at their prime in the reign of Edward I. But their decay was rapid, for shingle and sand, or river-mud, spoilt the harbours. Edward I rebuilt Winchelsea on a new site, now two miles inland: it was still prosperous under Edward III, and so was Sandwich. The wool trade made the eastern ports rise very quickly, particularly Yarmouth; and, fed by Flemish trade, the fairs of Stamford, Stourbridge near Cambridge, and Boston, were very important. So jealous were the men of the Cinque Ports that once, after co-operating with ships of the eastern ports in escorting king and army to Flanders, they turned on the eastern fleet, fought it, and won. Similarly the trade with Gascony and Spain brought prosperity to the south-west. The shipman mentioned by Chaucer (who died 1400) was of Dartmouth. The fleet during Edward III's siege of Calais consisted of 710 ships, manned by 14,151 men. The list shows the relative importance of the towns: Yarmouth 43 ships and 1095 men, Fowey 47 ships and 770 men, Dartmouth 31 ships, Plymouth 26, the king 25, London 25, Bristol 23, Sandwich 22, Southampton 21, Winchelsea 21, Shoreham 20, Looe 20, Lynn 19, Boston 17, Newcastle 17, Hull 16, Dover 16, Margate 15, Weymouth 15, Harwich 14, Ipswich 12, Rye 9, Hylhe 6, Haslings 5, Romney 4¹.

Rye

Chroniclers. Contemporary writers are mostly monks. Many an abbey kept its register of events, and at St Albans there was a regularly organized history department or scriptorium, monk after monk taking up the tale. They recorded facts faithfully enough, chiefly what interested the Church or their abbey. But they were bad judges of figures; 60,000 or 100,000 is a common total for an army, and they mention 30,000 students at Oxford! They wrote in Latin.

¹ Cinque Ports in italics

EDWARD II, 1307—1327

BANNOCKBURN, 1314. BOROUGHBRIDGE, 1322.

The custom of primogeniture is seen at its worst when Edward II comes to the throne. It is indeed strange that so feeble a character should have been the offspring of such parents as Edward I and Eleanor. The best that can be said of him is that after all his reign is not quite so bad as that of Stephen. The barons gained great power, and the ideal of Edward I, that the power of the crown should help to trim the ship of state against the barons, disappeared.

Lancaster and the Lords Ordainers. What first angered the barons was the insolent and ill-bred behaviour of the new king's Gascon favourite, Piers de Gaveston. At their head was Earl Thomas of Lancaster, son of Edmund, who had always been loyal to Edward I. Naturally, when the first cousin of a king puts himself at its head, the disaffected party is all the more strengthened. Thomas inherited his father's three earldoms of Lancaster, Leicester and Derby, and the march land round Monmouth, and shortly afterwards gained the earldom of Lincoln through his wife. Under him Parliament, which means the baronage, claimed to take over the government of the country into their own hands; in 1311 they forced Edward to submit to certain ordnances, depriving him of all power to govern, and appointed Lords Ordainers as a committee to supervise the administration of the kingdom. Next they got hold of Piers and murdered him.

Campaign and battle of Bannockburn. Meanwhile Robert Bruce was capturing castle after castle in Scotland. It was not till 1314, seven years after his accession, that Edward made some effort to check his career. Indeed, as in the previous reign, many barons devoted themselves to securing their own power as against the king, and cared nothing for the Scotch war. Only Stirling, Berwick, and a few other places, remained in English hands, and it was to save Stirling that Edward at last moved. A certain amount of controversy has arisen as to the size of the English army on this momentous occasion. We may, without any fear of contradiction, dismiss the popular error, which is still persistently put forward, that there were 40,000 horse and 60,000 foot. No medieval army ever approached anything like that number. There was no room for even a fraction of 100,000 men to manoeuvre on the battle field, let alone the horses. Moreover, the cost of 40,000 horses would have been beyond the means of any king or nation in those days. The records of the year have been lost, but we know that about 20,000 foot were summoned, and not all of those were archers; they came from the counties of the north, north midlands, the Welsh border, and Wales. Judging by other armies of the period we can guess the cavalry to have been about 2000, or 3000 at the very most; and as Earl Thomas and other lords refused to serve, 2000 is the more likely figure. On the other hand, 10,000 Scots all told is a fair estimate.

Once more, as in Wallace's days, the great middle plain of Scotland watered by the winding and twisting Forth was the scene of action. Stirling commanded the first bridge up-stream, close to where the tide ceases; it is very unusual to have to penetrate so far inland before finding a bridge, and a glance at the map will show the extreme importance of the place. The English approached from the south. From their side of the field you look down a slope to the valley cut by the Bannock, a burn flowing from west to east and tributary to the Forth. On the north side the Scots are hidden in a wood, the King's Park, which in those days covered most of the ground between Stirling and the burn, and an old road runs across the burn and up the slope into the wood. In middle distance rises the Rock of Stirling, crowned by its castle. Beyond are the Ochils, and out to the far west the higher mountains among which Ben Ledi is conspicuous.

Stirling from the North: Wallace's victory beneath the rock: Bannockburn exactly the other side beyond

Bruce held the entry to the wood with his rear schiltron, and on either side of the road had dug several little pits. On the afternoon of June 23 the English van attacked by the road and were repulsed, Bruce killing Henry Bohun with his axe. Meanwhile a body of mounted men made a wide detour to the right, crossed the Bannock lower down, and nearly reached Stirling; Moray issued from the wood, formed up his schiltron like a hedgehog with its spikes out, and repulsed the English cavalry with loss.

Where the main battle was fought on June 24 is not certain. The usual account, sanctioned by Walter Scott, puts it near where Bohun fell. But the chief Scottish authority, the poet John Barbour¹ of St Andrews, says very clearly that the English crossed overnight and slept on the carse or low ground well to the east, in fact where the horsemen passed before Moray beat them; Barbour wrote 70 years afterwards, but the shorter accounts of several contemporary English chroniclers agree fairly well with him. Yet, whether King Edward advanced from south to north, or from east to west, the details of the fight are clear. Bruce quitted the wood and put three schiltrons in échelon, the right ahead of the centre, and the centre of the left, he himself was with the reserve, and a picked body of light horse were hidden in the trees. A skirmishing line of English archers advanced, and then withdrew towards a flank to allow the mounted men to charge. The closely packed horses and men came with a crash on to the pikes of the schiltions, right, centre, and left in turn. The archers from the flank poured in their arrows, but suddenly were cut up by the light Scottish horse who dashed out of the wood. Meanwhile the great majority of the remaining archers were useless in the rear, and indeed were never in action at all. When at last the cavalry broke the whole of the English army broke with them, and knight and archer, soldier and camp-follower, fled wildly into the Bannock or the Forth. The loss of life in battle or by drowning was very great. The Earl of Gloucester, son of Edward I's old enemy and last of the line of Clare, was killed. Hereford, son of the Bohun of 1297, was taken prisoner. King Edward, who according to every account had fought bravely enough, fled to the gate of the castle of Stirling, but was refused admittance, and reached Berwick with difficulty. The battle was quite decisive. Stirling was surrendered to Bruce, and Scotland was free.

¹ See W. M. Mackenzie's edition of The Brus.

Scottish raids into North England. Bruce had adopted Wallace's tactics in battle. But to carry the war into England he developed his own ideas. He mounted his men, very few of them having iron armour, on moorland ponies. They rode light, each man carrying only a bag of oatmeal and a small gridiron to make girdle cakes, and otherwise they subsisted on plunder. Year after year they raided the northern counties, exacted blackmail from towns and monasteries, and spread a veritable reign of terror as far as York and even further, but without ever fighting a pitched battle. The English of the north had not yet learnt the art of self-defence; they seemed to be quite unwarlike and cowered before Bruce's raiders. The king did nothing to help them. Yet Norham Castle held out well under Sir Thomas Grey. Once a certain Marmion came here to fight the Scots and win his lady's favour; so Sir Walter Scott connects the Marmion of fiction with Norham, but lays the scene of his poem 200 years later in the Flodden campaign. Bruce himself failed to capture Carlisle, held by Andrew Hartley or Harcla. It was this Andrew who first taught the English to raise light cavalry like the Scots, called hobelars, i.e. men mounted on hobby horses; it is a word for a pony. But Berwick fell to Bruce in 1318.

Rebel barons at Boroughbridge Meanwhile Edward had found a new favourite named Hugh the Despenser, who had a son of the same name. The son was married to one of the sisters and co-heiresses of the last Earl of Gloucester, who fell at Bannockburn, and it much angered the barons that he thus obtained Glamorgan when the Gloucester inheritance was divided. Thomas of Lancaster, and the Earl of Hereford, who had been ransomed since Bannockburn, headed the discontented barons. At last in 1322 Edward brought down Andrew from Westmoreland, who fought and beat the rebels at Boroughbridge in Yorkshire; he dismounted his spearmen and formed them in schiltrons, just like the Scots, but with archers on their flanks. Hereford was slain, and Lancaster was captured and executed in his own castle of Pomfret.

The same year Edward made a feeble attempt to avenge Bannockburn. Stupidly thinking that the Scots had won only because they had fought with pikes on foot, he summoned large numbers of foot spearmen, but no archers. This is the first time in the Scottish wars that an army was raised from all the counties of England, for Bruce's raids had exhausted the north. About 7000 English and 7000 Welsh crossed the border. Bruce refused battle; the whole army either starved or straggled home again in terrible plight, and the king himself was nearly captured.

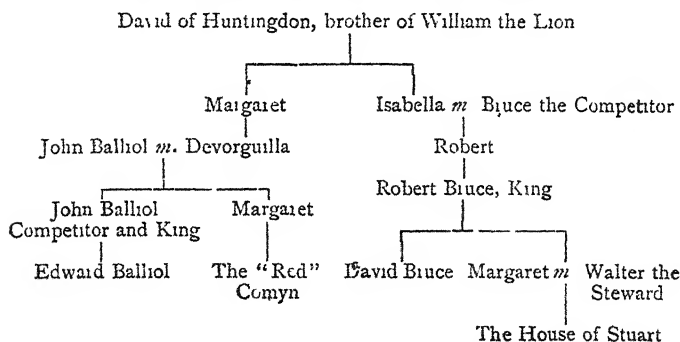

The rights of the Commons. This year 1322 saw something of real and lasting importance. In a Parliament at York the right of the Commons to share in legislation and government was formally acknowledged, the ordinances of 1311 being cancelled because they were the work of the barons only. The king was obviously looking to the commons to counter-balance the nobles. But we notice that the clergy as a body were not represented; they preferred to tax themselves in their own House of Convocation, which had no share in practical politics. The archbishops, bishops and mitred abbots continued, however, to sit in Parliament, for they were barons as well as prelates.

At last the end came in 1326. Edward's own wife, Isabella of France, and her favourite, Lord Mortimer, rose against the Despensers, who were both hanged. Next year Parliament deposed Edward, but nominally in favour of his own son. He was soon murdered in Berkeley Castle.

In this reign the Order of the Knights Templars was suppressed by order of the Pope. Much of their property passed to their rivals the Hospitallers. Their London house, situated on the "strand" of the river a mile west of the city walls, came into the hands of the lawyers and belongs to them still, though it preserves the name of the Temple.

THE ROYAL FAMILY OF SCOTLAND

EDWARD III, 1327—1377

HALIDON HILL, 1333.

SLUYS, 1340.

CRECY, 1346.

POITIERS, 1356.

TREATY OF BRETAGNY, 1360.

NAVARETTE, 1367, FOLLOWED BY LOSS OF FRANCE.

THE GOOD PARLIAMENT, 1376.

Though the change of sovereigns was brought about by rebellion, we notice that the custom of primogeniture was retained. Edward III, thus brought to the throne as a boy of fourteen, reigned for fifty years. Under him Parliament grew stronger and stronger, for he was entirely dependent upon it for money for his wars. He was popular, gallant, and to all appearance glorious. He was excessively fond of show, of the glitter and tinsel of tournaments, "round tables" and feats of chivalry. He constantly played at being King Arthur with his nobles as Arthur's knights, and feasted at a round table in the great hall of Windsor. He founded the Order of the Garter. Of course there is another side to the picture. His wars caused intense misery in France, and these heroes of chivalry could be desperately cruel to those of lower birth. Yet the yeomen and small freeholders and copyholders of England, the bold peasantry who are a country's pride, gained enormously by his wars, for they learnt the lesson of their own importance, when both king and nobles were dependent upon them to fill up the ranks of the army. The long bows of England and the strong English arms which drew them not only were celebrated through Europe, but compelled recognition at home. This reign saw the feudal system break down finally and completely as a means of raising troops. Every man from prince to peasant was now paid for his service.

Bruce's last raid and treaty. Bruce, then on his deathbed, sent Lord James Douglas on his last raid into Northumberland, the terror of which is graphically described Halidon Hill from Berwick : battle fought on the further side of the hill. Stephenson's railway bridge in the foreground to us by Jehan le Bel, a chronicler from Hainault. The young king had just married Philippa of Hainault, and the chronicler was in her train. The more celebrated Froissart, also a Hainaulter (born 1337), copied a great deal from Jehan le Bel. The raid was followed by "the shameful treaty" of Northampton, by which Bruce's full independence was acknowledged. It was partly the disgust caused by this treaty that led many of the English barons to join against Mortimer and Isabella; Mortimer was executed, and Isabella imprisoned for life.

England's revenge for Bannockburn. Bruce died in 1329, and James Douglas met his death while carrying Bruce's heart to the Holy Land. David Bruce was a child. Almost at once Edward Balliol, son of the late King John Battle of Halidon Hill, 1333: Sc, Scottish Army; E, English;

C, Castle; B, Berwick

Balliol, put in a claim to the Scottish throne, and won over some adventurous Englishmen to join him. He went by sea to Fifeshire, and won a victory against great odds at Dupplin Moor near Perth in 1332. Next year Edward of England took up the cause of Edward Balliol, for the Treaty of Northampton had been made by the usurper Mortimer, and moreover young David's guardians refused to carry out their part of the agreement. The two Edwards laid siege to Berwick, and took up a position on Halidon Hill between the sea and a tributary of the Tweed. A Scottish army coming to relieve Berwick was forced to attack the hill, for there was no means of working round either flank. Edward dismounted his mailed men-at-arms and formed them in three schiltrons with their cavalry lances used as pikes; between each dismounted body he placed a hollow wedge of archers with the apex pointing towards the enemy. These hollow wedges of archers were called horses or harrows. The charging Scots were blinded by the arrows and forced into the intermediate spaces in front of the lances. They broke, and the English then mounted and pursued. "There wonne the archers of Yngelonde great laud," says Capgrave, the first chronicler who wrote English history in English. Berwick surrendered, and henceforward was an English town and a gateway into Scotland.

Halidon Hill was a critical battle which shows that the lesson of Bannockburn had been learnt, for knights and archers now supported each other. The same tactics triumphed again and again in the next hundred years.

One more military reform must be noticed; about this period the archers were mostly mounted on ponies, and so were able to keep pace with the Scots, but they dismounted to shoot. The North had at last asserted itself and could face the Scots, no longer liable to panic when raided, but able to win victories.

Balliol surrendered to England a great piece of the south-east of Scotland, and was himself to be the vassal king of the remainder. But the English were never able to hold more than Berwick. The war between the two nations dragged on. Balliol had to take refuge again in England. Finally the long French war attracted all the energies of England. Scotland offered hard blows and very little plunder, war in France less trouble and more loot. Yet the main reason of Scotland's continued independence was Scottish grit and endurance.

The Hundred Years' War begins. The first cause of the French war was the alliance of France with Scotland. But even more important was the French king's determination to conquer Gascony, a policy which he had inherited. Besides these there was a third cause to be found in Flanders; the Count of Flanders was a vassal of the King of France, and looked to France for help to conquer the great manufacturing cities, such as Ghent and Bruges, which were practically independent of him, the king of England was only too glad to help the Flemings who bought the valuable English wool. Moreover the rival sailors and fisher-folk of each coast were always fighting, and French raids were often quite successful against our ports from Dover even as far as Bristol. Edward's mother Isabella had claimed the throne of France for him, for she was sister of the late king. But the French had previously protested against a woman's inheriting the crown, relying professedly on a supposed "Salic" law, but really having in view the sensible idea of "France for a Frenchman." They chose Philip VI of Valois, Isabella's cousin, and Edward III did homage to him for Gascony. It was not till later that Edward seriously put forward his claim to the French crown.

Money troubles and a sea victory. The war was very popular in England at first and Parliament voted large sums. Yet Edward gained no great victories; and when he took his armies to Flanders his many allies there helped him to spend but not to fight, with the result that he became so hard pressed for money that once he actually had to pawn his crown, and on another occasion to leave two earls as hostages, before he was allowed to return to England. He once accused his ministers of cheating him, and they promptly claimed their right of being tried by their equals or peers; the right was recognized and to the present day a peer can claim in certain cases to be tried by the House

Berwick upon Tweed as re-fortified by Elizabeth ; the border-bridge built by James I ; castle where
now is railway station ; Halidon Hill to left of Lords. Yet Edward won a very great victory at sea in 1340 off the port of Sluys, close to the scene of John's victory off Damme, just where the canal from the interior of Flanders comes down to the sea at the sluice-gates. To commemorate this victory Edward struck the first English gold coins, bearing the design of a ship and himself standing in it with a shield whereon the leopards of England and the lilies of France are quartered together. Down to the reign of George III the lilies were always carried as part of the royal arms of England. The war now died down in Flanders but broke out shortly in Brittany.

Campaign and Battle of Crecy. There was no fighting of any importance till the year 1346. The French were then making a vigorous attack upon Gascony. Edward being in great want of money repudiated his debts to the merchants of Florence and other great cities of Italy, thereby causing very grave distress to the lenders who had trusted him. With new sums of money voted to him by Parliament, in place of paying his debts, he equipped a new army. Every single man was paid, from the archer who got threepence a day up to the king's own son,—who was then sixteen years old and is for ever celebrated as the Black Prince,—who received £1. About 2500 nobles, knights and men-at-arms were mustered at Portsmouth, and about 7500¹ archers. Contrary winds would not allow the expedition to pass down channel; and Edward suddenly determined to land in Normandy, hoping thus to draw away the French from Gascony. The English landed and pillaged far and ¹ Jehan le Bel, the most moderate chronicler, says 4000 men-at-arms, 10,000 archers, 10,000 other foot, "and not more whatever anybody may say." But even his figures seem rather too high, we know from documents that there were about 600 knights, and can add three common men-at-arms to each knight. The "other foot" and camp-followers were not good fighting material. Compare the authentic figures of the army which besieged Calais, and remember that it had been very largely reinforced since Crecy.

wide. But then the fleet deserted; Edward probably gave leave for some of the ships to return home, for they were ordinary trading vessels, and the rest took French leave. At any rate here was an English army stranded in France and liable to be overwhelmed by the superior numbers of French who were hurrying up from every direction. At last it managed to cross the Seine not far from Paris, and then marched fast to the north towards the mouth of the next river, the Somme, crossed it at low tide by the ford of Blanchetaque and turned round at bay upon a hill-slope near the little town of Crecy. The country here was called Ponthieu, and was claimed by Edward as the inheritance of his grandmother Eleanor of Castile. A battle had to be risked, for the expected new fleet was not yet in sight. It was now six weeks since the first landing in Normandy.

Sir Geoffrey Loutterell being armed, d. 1345

The immediate purpose of the campaign had been effected, for the bulk of the French troops had been called off from Gascony.

The English had a full day's rest at Crecy before the great French host slowly crossed the Somme at Abbeville. The Halidon Hill formation was adopted; two bodies of dismounted knights and men-at-arms were in the background, with three herse or hollow wedges of archers on the flanks and in the centre. Edward had a large reserve in the rear on the top of the slope, and took his stand on a windmill whence he could see the whole field. Slowly the French came up under King Philip himself, and late on the afternoon of August 26 delivered their attack. First a few hundred Genoese cross-bowmen were pushed forward, but were no match for the English long-bows. Then the French cavalry charged, while the archers from their hollow wedges poured in their arrows. The horses were maddened and could hardly be brought to face the storm; charge after charge was fruitless. Yet once some cavalry burst through the zone of "fire" just before sunset, and reached the English line, where the young prince and his bodyguard, dismounted like everybody else, fought them hand to hand. It was then that the king refused to send reinforcements so that "the boy might win his spurs." By nightfall the French had been everywhere repulsed, but there was no counter-charge or pursuit.

Battle of Crecy, August 26, 1346

Neville's Cross and Calais. The victory was considerable and came as a great surprise. That the celebrated chivalry of France should be routed by men of whose capacity in war nobody had had any knowledge, by mere plebeians armed with weapons of no reputation such as bows, came as a shock to all Europe. Edward at once took advantage of his success and of the arrival of his new fleet, which occurred shortly afterwards, and laid siege to Calais. A great deal of determination was shown in this siege, neither Edward nor the prince went home, but remained in camp through the whole winter. In the meanwhile an army of Scots invaded England in October, but was badly beaten by the north-country English at Neville's Cross near Durham. Once more the long-bows won the day, and David Bruce was taken prisoner. Thus there was no need for Edward to relax his grasp on Calais. Next year reinforcements poured in, until by July 32,000 soldiers of all ranks were assembled, over 5000 heavy cavalry, 5000 horse and 15,000 foot archers, with other infantry and a few foreign mercenaries, while a fleet of 700 ships and 14,000 sailors blockaded the port or were plying to and fro between the army and England. This is the maximum force which England could bring to bear in the middle ages, when almost every available competent soldier was put into the field. Calais was, after a siege of eleven months, surrendered in July 1347, Philip not daring to risk a battle to save it. Henceforward for over two centuries the English had always in Calais a gateway into France, not only for their armies, but also for their wool.

Fowey (Troy Town); contributed many ships to Edward III's fleet

A great deal of our information comes from Froissart, the chronicler from Hainault who was devoted to Queen Philippa, but he was only a boy at this date and wrote much later with a good deal of exaggeration, relying on gossip which he had picked up from various actors in the scene. He saw only the showy side of war, the glitter and the excitement. He was particularly attached to the Black Prince, in whose honour on his triumphal return home Edward founded the Order of the Knights of the Garter, their headquarters were at St George's chapel in Windsor, where the castle was now rebuilt as the chief royal residence by Bishop William of Wykeham.

The Black Death and wages. But now we have the other side of the picture. A fearful plague came from the east and broke over both France and England. It was known as the Black Death. Nearly half the population was carried off within some three years. Yet the terrible misery thus caused was not in itself so important as the political result. For a long time past the English villeins or peasants had been gradually bettering themselves; many of them had been able to purchase their freedom and had become, not full free-holders of land, but "copy-holders"—so-called because they held copies of the documents which attested the purchase; often a lord of the manor preferred to pay his villeins for their work done for him, and on the other hand received rent from them for their little holdings. Now after the Black Death the villeins were so few in number that they could demand very high wages. Parliament was almost entirely composed of landowners, and in 1351 it passed a law, the Statute of Labourers, to cut down wages to the level at which they stood before the Black Death. Efforts were also made to bring back the strict old-fashioned state of villeinage. But in spite of everything the peasants thrived more and more. The Black Death did not immediately and solely make the villeins free, but contributed with other causes to free them somewhat more speedily than would otherwise have been the case. They knew their own value as workmen, and they could ever demand higher wages as archers. The statute finally became a dead letter.

England, Rome, and Avignon. Since 1305 the seat of the Papacy had been, not at Rome, but at Avignon on the Rhone in Provence, adjacent to the frontier of France, and it continued there till the end of Edward's reign. For no less than seventy years the popes were in fact little more than the prisoners of the kings of France. Thus Edward III, being the open enemy of France, was the first English king since John who refused to submit to be the vassal of the pope; he discontinued the payment of the thousand marks which had first been paid by John. Each pope tried hard to retain the allegiance of Edward, and on one occasion, when a pope confirmed his choice of a good warrior but poor scholar to be Bishop of Durham, men said that if he had nominated a donkey the pope would have sanctioned it. Again and again did the Church try to negotiate peace between England and France. Only through the king of England could the pope retain overlordship over England; Parliament had always been much more bitter than any king against the papal power. Just at this date two laws were passed. The one, called the Statute of Provisors, forbade clergymen to receive appointments in England from the pope without the king's consent; the other, the Statute of Praemunire, forbade any appeal to a pope or the acceptance of orders from a pope in England, except with the king's consent. It is hardly likely that these extreme measures would have been passed if it had not been for the exile at Avignon. Lasting for seventy years it is called the Babylonish captivity, because the Jews had been exiles in Babylon for seventy years.

The Black Prince at Poitiers. We return to the war in France. Since the fall of Calais there had been a great deal of fighting on a small scale in many parts, but in 1355 the Black Prince, now a man, went to live at Bordeaux, the capital of Gascony. He raided French territory that year and again in 1356. On his way home to Bordeaux with an immense amount of plunder he encountered the army of John, the new king of France. He faced round to fight a few miles from the town of Poitiers, about forty miles south of the river Loire. The French, departing from their tactics at Crecy, came to the attack on foot, except one small mounted body which tried to rush the archers on horseback. The English victory was more complete than at Crecy. The Prince, though greatly outnumbered, not only repulsed them, but followed up and made a counter-attack. He had a small mounted reserve, and also sent some Gascons to make a wide detour and fall on the French rear. At the critical moment, when the attacking French were in a confused mass, Sir John Chandos gave the word for the counter-charge, which was decisive. The Prince secured an enormous number of prisoners, and amongst them King John.

Then France felt all the miseries of defeat. The king and nobles were held to ransom, and the French peasants were expected to pay. The sums demanded were so enormous that the country was drained, yet the full ransoms were not forthcoming. The peasants, maddened by pillage as well as by these exactions, rose in many places; the movement is called the Jacquerie from the name of one Jacques Bonhomme. There was also a city rising at Paris. And as if the English enemies were not enough, bands of mercenaries and adventurers from Germany, the Netherlands, and even from many parts of France itself, plundered and tortured in every direction. These bands are known as the Free Companies. The Eng'ish were responsible for the presence of these brigands in France, but very few of them were English. In 1359 King Edward invaded again in person. No great battle was fought, and in 1360 was drawn up the Treaty of Bretigny. Edward gave up his claim to the French crown, but was to hold in full sovereignty, and not as vassal of the French king, Calais, Ponthieu at the mouth of the Somme, and the whole Duchy of Aquitaine, from the Loire to the Pyrenees, which had been the original possession of Henry II. This treaty cancelled Henry III's Treaty of Paris,

Norman and Plantagenet possessions in France

The English lose ground in France. The Black Prince reigned at Bordeaux as duke and viceroy. He had an extravagant court and was much too fond of show. Soon, being pressed for money, he went into Spain, like any common mercenary, to fight for King Peter who was at war with his brother Henry. A great Breton warrior, Bertrand du Guesclin, collected many of the French-speaking free companies and took service under Henry. The Prince won a notable victory in North Spain, between the villages of Navarette and Najara, in 1367. But Peter refused to pay him his wages and retreated to his fortresses. The very hot weather and sickness crippled the English army, and the Prince returned to Bordeaux ruined in health and pocket. Then he laid a tax upon the Gascons which they resented, and they appealed to the king of France, Charles V. The Treaty of Bretigny was repudiated and the French now got their revenge. Bertrand was made Constable of France and his free companies were taken into pay as regular French soldiers. He adopted the Scottish plan of wearing out the English by refusing a pitched battle. He secured town after town and castle after castle by surprise or treachery. As the Gascons joined the French the English were greatly outnumbered. The Spanish fleet came up and won a victory off La Rochelle, so that England lost the control of the sea which since the battle of Sluys had enabled troops to be landed anywhere in France. Chandos and many old soldiers were dead, the Black Prince too ill to fight, and his brother John of Gaunt utterly incompetent. Very soon only Calais and a mere strip of Gascony along the coast between Bayonne and Bordeaux remained in English hands.

Wycliffe and the Lollards. At home the closing years of Edward III were full of interest. John Wycliffe, Master of Balliol College at Oxford, attacked the Church and the priests, and collected a band of devoted men whom he sent round the country preaching. Wycliffe's followers were the famous Lollards. He translated the Bible into English which is not so very unlike what we speak now. He even in the next reign attacked the doctrine of Transubstantiation, and was one of the first to declare that the bread and wine in the sacrament were not actually changed into Christ's Body and Blood, but were only symbols. However much we may revere his memory we cannot be surprised at the excitement which he caused. To attack the doctrine of the Church was something wholly new in England, even though the vices and ambitions of churchmen had been often enough blamed and ridiculed. It was unfortunate for him that his cause was taken up by John of Gaunt, a self-seeking and ambitious man who attacked the Church for purely selfish reasons. On the other side the best of the churchmen was William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, architect of Windsor Castle, and founder in the next reign of New College at Oxford and of Winchester School.

Impeachments by the Good Parliament. John of Gaunt gained complete control over his father who was now in his dotage; he turned out the clerical ministers such as Wykeham, and brought in his own favourites. In 1376 what is known as the Good Parliament, enjoying the support of the Black Prince, attacked John and impeached his favourites who had been guilty of injustice and bribery. This is the first instance of the use of the celebrated method of impeachment, by which the House of Commons, when it considers the king's ministers to be in the wrong, claims the right to accuse them before the House of Lords. The knights of the shire were now definitely joined to the members of the towns to form a House of Commons. Its president was known as "the Speaker," that is to say the man who speaks the will of the members before the king. The Speaker in the Good Parliament was Sir Peter de la Mare. The House of Lords has always been the supreme court of law, and therefore it was right to summon ministers before it. The ministers of John of Gaunt, Lords Latimer and Neville, were condemned on this occasion.

But the Black Prince died, and Gaunt soon regained his power. The Bishop of London cited Wycliffe to appear to answer a charge of heresy; down came Gaunt to St Paul's Cathedral, stopped the trial and carried Wycliffe off by force of arms. The Londoneis rose in excitement and sacked Gaunt's mansion, the Savoy. There is little doubt that he was aiming at the throne, either to dispossess the Black Prince's son Richard, or to be acknowledged as Richard's heir. There is this to be said in his favour; he was the enemy of the Church, and as the chroniclers were all churchmen they have probably blackened his memory in history, making him out to be somewhat worse than he really was. What we chiefly dislike about him is that he damaged Wycliffe's reputation and power for good.

Pictures of life in England. Though Chaucer lived into the next reign, we may speak of him here. His chief poem is the Canterbury Tales, a series of stories told by a number of pilgrims as they rode from London to Canterbury to pay their devotions at the shrine of Thomas Becket. His descriptions of the pilgrims give us a wonderfully interesting picture of the men and women of the time. There were a knight, who had fought in the later crusades, "a very perfect gentle knight"; his son, a hot-headed young squire; his attendant yeoman, a green-coated archer who "bare a mighty bow" and a sheaf of peacock arrows. Next came a prioress, very dainty in her manners; a monk, who was far more fond of hunting than the sound of his chapel bell; a friar, who knew all the taverns in town and was the best beggar of alms in all his house. But Chaucer's sarcasms against the Church need not make us think that there were no good monks and friars, though his dislike was probably shared by many others of his time. There was, in the way of contrast, a poor parish parson, the very model of a devout and devoted man:

"But Christ's own lore and His Apostles twelve
He taught, but first he followed it himself."

There were a merchant, who traded between Ipswich and Holland; a student of Oxford, who spent all his money upon books; a Franklin, or country gentleman, who was devoted to eating and drinking; five rich London tradesmen and their cook; a doctor; a shipman of Dartmouth, who had often sailed to Bordeaux and to Spain; a ploughman, who was the poor parson's brother, and a noble and unselfish worker; a miller; and a woman, called the Wife of Bath, who was renowned for her weaving in which she surpassed even the men of Ypres and Ghent.

Canterbury Pilgrims

In 1376 died the Black Prince, and in 1377 Edward III. His corpse was left stripped and naked on his death bed; the rings were torn from his fingers—a miserable ending truly for the would-be star of chivalry. The glorious reign of victories had ended in defeat and loss. But in these fifty years the peasants were learning their true strength and were prospering greatly. The towns, profiting by the wool trade and the general commerce which came with it, were both active and busy. Englishmen were beginning to weave their wool as well as the Flemings, and did not only export it. Norwich had become the second city of the kingdom. The western ports, such as Bristol, Fowey, Dartmouth, Exeter, and on the other side Hull, Boston, Ipswich, Yarmouth, were growing fast as trading centres and had quite supplanted the old Cinque Ports. But the triumphs of Crecy and Poitiers, the wealth brought into England by the ransoms of French prisoners and by loot, had given rise to a spirit of pride and luxury hitherto unknown. When the Hundred Years' War began, chroniclers pointed to France as the land of wealth and overweening extravagant show, later they used exactly the same language of the upper classes of England.

Canterbury Cathedral. The original Norman work was burnt down. The "Harry" Bell Tower was finished shortly before 1500

RICHARD II, 1377—1399

THE PEASANTS' REVOLT, 1381.

WYCLIFFE DIES, 1384.

A period of discontent. Richard II succeeded, being the Black Prince's only son. His uncle John of Gaunt was the chief man in England during his minority, and with all his pushing and over-bearing nature he was an incompetent ruler. In 1381 came the Peasants' Revolt. The villeins, and those peasants who had managed to rise above villeinage, were a strong and sturdy lot, rough in manners, but well fed and conscious of their power. They resented the Statute of Labourers, and every attempt to re-introduce serfdom. The revolt in Kent, headed by Wat Tyler, was caused by a new and heavy tax called the Poll Tax, which was levied upon every poll or head. Moreover the French war, for which it was levied, was going very badly. The example of Kent was copied elsewhere, especially in the eastern counties. John Ball, a priest, stirred up the people by his clever tongue, teaching that all men were equal.

“When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?”

Wat Tyler's men reached London, and there Wat was slain by the Lord Mayor. Then Richard, a boy of sixteen, declared that he would be the peasants' leader. But Parliament was composed of landowners, and bitter vengeance was taken on the peasants who thought that their grievances were going to be redressed. For instance, at St Albans John Ball was executed, and the promises of liberty and privileges, granted by the abbot when he had thought his life to be in danger, were cancelled. Yet none the less the peasants rallied in time and continued to prosper, and villeinage gradually died out.

Meanwhile Wycliffe had continued his career of preaching and teaching. It was now that he attacked the doctrine as well as the behaviour of the Church, and wrote against Transubstantiation. He was much helped by Richard's wife, Anne of Bohemia; his views had spread in that country, where the reformers were called Hussites from his follower, John Huss. Yet the Lollards lost ground. The Babylonish captivity at Avignon came to an end, a great schism in the Church was at last stopped by a Council held at Constance, and Huss was burnt. In England the bishops attacked Wycliffe, and, although they were unable to have him put to death as they would have liked, he had to retire to his parish of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, where he remained till his death. His revolt against the Church and the peasants' revolt against the government had much in common, and were signs of the discontent of the time.

Government by standing army. The barons in this reign, as in so many others, were very selfish and grasping. They attacked Richard's favourites, their leaders being called the Lords Appellant, because they "appealed," that is to say accused, of treason these favourites. Richard at last triumphed over them, and began to rule as a tyrant, surrounded by a bodyguard of archers from the loyal county of Chester. He was very popular in Wales and Chester, where the memory of the Black Prince was cherished. It is difficult to avoid feeling some sympathy for him, for the barons, who had made him break his word to Wat Tyler's followers, acted in utter disregard of his rights, as if the king ought to have no voice in the government. But his was the only attempt since the reign of John to govern by downright military force. He was able to raise his little standing army from Chester as a county palatine; for having no son he was himself Prince of Wales and Earl Palatine of Chester.

Revolt of Henry of Lancaster. Parliament had decided that the heir to the throne was Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, son of Philippa, who was daughter of Lionel of Clarence¹, the next brother to the Black Prince. But Mortimer died in 1398, leaving a son. John of Gaunt was next brother to Lionel. He had a son Henry, who, like every man of the house of Lancaster, married an heiress, Mary Bohun, daughter of the last Earl of Hereford of that family. When Gaunt died, Henry had claim to four earldoms through his mother Blanche, Gaunt's wife, namely Lancaster, Leicester, Derby, Lincoln, and three earldoms through his wife Mary, namely Hereford, Essex and Northampton; and, in addition, all the Lancastrian and Bohun march lands, Monmouth, Kidwelly and Brecknock. He had been exiled by Richard, and was then crusading in the east of Germany against the heathen Prussians. Richard seized to himself all the lands on Gaunt's death. Henry retaliated by landing in Yorkshire in arms to win his own vast inheritance, and rallied round him all the discontented. Richard was then in Ireland, and on hurrying back he was overpowered at Flint before he had time to collect his forces. He was dethroned by Act of Parliament, and afterwards murdered in Pontefract or Pomfret castle.

¹ See pp 175 and 187.

HOUSE OF LANCASTER, 1399—1461

HENRY IV, 1399—1413

BATTLE OF SHREWSBURY, 1403.

The successful rebel took the title of Henry IV. He claimed to have obtained his crown by grant of Parliament, but this Parliament was simply giving its sanction to successful rebellion and murder. When Edward II was dethroned and murdered, the crown went to his true heir and son. Henry IV was not the true heir to Richard, for the previous Parliament had declared for Roger Mortimer, whose son Edmund was alive. Thus one Parliament proceeded to do exactly the opposite of what a previous Parliament had done, a fact which shows that the party of rebellion found it convenient to give to their actions some semblance of legality. But the legality was open to question; and when there are difficulties about the succession to the crown, civil war follows sooner or later.

This was therefore quite an unhappy reign for the king himself. The baronage at first dominated Parliament, and the king was weak. In spite of his enormous private wealth he was always in difficulties, for he had to reward those who had made him king. Personally he was a conscientious man, but he had to suffer for the rebellion which gave him the throne and the crime which followed. In particular he was forced to seek the support of the Church. So it came to pass that he, the son of John of Gaunt who had helped Wycliffe, had to secure the support of the papacy by persecuting the Lollards. The celebrated Act of Parliament, De Heretico Comburendo, enforced burning as the punishment for heretics, and so Lollardy was ultimately stamped out. Yet Parliament did not love the Church, and attacks were made upon its property.

A rebellion against the rebel. Trouble broke out on the Scottish border. The English Percies and the Scottish Douglasses were continually fighting, and the Earl of Northumberland, the head of the Percies, took Douglas prisoner. Henry claimed that the prisoner should be his. Northumberland had been one of Henry's supporters against Richard, and he did not mean to let the king, whom he had helped to put on the throne, dictate to him. It was easy to find an excuse to rebel against a rebel. Therefore the Percies got up a conspiracy. At the same time a great Welsh patriot, Owen Glendower, had broken out in North Wales and defied every effort of the English to suppress him. The rebel Percies marched towards Wales to make common cause with Glendower. Henry's forces intercepted them near Shrewsbury and won a victory in which Northumberland's son, known as Harry Hotspur, a dashing and hot-tempered young man, was killed. The formidable conspiracy was broken. But Glendower, who had been too far from Shrewsbury to bring any help, held out in his native mountains and was never caught; we do not know the exact date of his death.

New progress of the Commons. Now it was the turn of the Commons. They claimed the exclusive right to vote grants of money; they even went further, and demanded control of the royal accounts. They dictated who should be the king's councillors, and even the ministers of his household. The power thus gained was only temporary, yet was of extreme importance as giving an example that a future House of Commons might copy. Looking back to Edward II, we recall that he had been supported by the old claim his day against the Lords Ordainers; it was new, but was natural, for the Commons now to profit by the mutual weakening of king and barons to assert themselves.

The rest of the reign is uneventful. There had been quarrels between two parties at the French court, and for many years there had been no war between England and France, whose king, Charles VI, was out of his mind. Henry IV died in 1413, still unhappy and harassed in all that he attempted, in spite of his triumph over the rebels at Shrewsbury.

HOUSE OF LANCASTER.

HENRY V, 1413—1422

AGINCOURT, 1415.

TREATY OF TROYES, 1420.

Henry V had been known as Madcap Hal when he was Prince of Wales. Stories of his wildness when a young man are preserved for us by Shakespeare, and he is supposed to have had a companion in evil to whom the poet has given the name of John Falstaff, the drunken fat knight. He really had a friend called John Oldcastle, who was a Lollard and a fine man. It seems that the Church blackened the memory of Oldcastle, so that he appears in Shakespeare caricatured as Falstaff. The Henry of Shakespeare disowned Falstaff when he became king. The Henry of history allowed Oldcastle to be captured and burnt. The Lollards were now regarded as rebels, and we hear no more of them after this reign.

The French war renewed. Henry was an earnest and energetic king. Every one knows that he was a great soldier. He posed as the patriot who would renew the war against France and bring back the glories of Edward III. He was religious and expressed sorrow for the murder of Richard. But above all he was intensely ambitious. War would divert men's minds from the troubles of the last reign, would make them forget the rebellion and murder, and check the alarming growth of the power of the Commons.

No excuse was needed. Henry put forward the old claim of Edward III through his mother Isabella. But it was clearly absurd to demand the throne of France by a woman, and at the same time to be king of England by disregarding the similar claim of Edmund Mortimer. The very year of Agincourt saw a conspiracy got up by the Earl of Cambridge, younger brother of the Duke of York, and husband of Anne Mortimer, Edmund's sister. It was nipped in the bud, and Cambridge was executed; York fought and died for Henry at Agincourt.

Harfleur followed by Agincourt. Henry's war was quite unlike Edward's. Edward had fought in 1346 in a haphazard way, had won at Crecy when brought to bay, and then laid siege to Calais; Henry began with a siege and then fought a great battle. Edward's campaigns were little more than plundering raids. Henry set before himself a definite task, to conquer only a piece of France, namely Normandy, but to conquer that piece thoroughly. He started from Southampton in 1415, and at once besieged Harfleur with about 10,000 men, all of them paid. He captured the place by storm, though his men suffered much from sickness. With less than 5000 he then marched along the coast hoping to lure the French into risking a pitched battle, found the ford of Blanchetaque too strongly guarded, turned up the river Somme, and crossed it several miles inland. The French, under the king's son, the Dauphin (a title in France corresponding to our Prince of Wales), blocked his way, as he was advancing on Calais, at a little village called Agincourt. Thus the English fought with their faces to the north towards Calais. The road ran over a flat piece of ground only a quarter of a mile wide between two woods, and here the French were posted. Not only was the narrowness of the ground in Henry's favour, for the French were too crowded to fight well, but the earth was newly ploughed and drenched with rain. Stung by the volleys of arrows the French attacked; a few mounted men on each wing were easily beaten: the mass of them on foot, as at Poitiers, floundered and slipped in the mud and sank in their heavy plate armour, so that the nimble English archers had no need to kill them, but only to knock them down. It was a crushing victory, won against very great odds. The date was October 25.

Plate armour and "camail" for the throat
as worn at Agincourt

Treaty of Troyes; but war drags on. Henry did nothing more this year but return to England. In 1417 he went over again, and kept to his plan of conquering Normandy by degrees. At last Rouen fell. He made an alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, a cousin of the French king, but a bitter enemy of the Dauphin. In 1420 the French court made peace by the Treaty of Troyes, by which Henry was acknowledged as the heir to the French throne. Of course the Dauphin would not agree to this, but since Agincourt he was quite powerless, especially as the Burgundians sided with England. Henry married Catharine, Charles VI's daughter.

Complete plate armour; Wars of the Roses

Some Scots came over to help the Dauphin, and at Beaugé beat Henry's brother Clarence. Roused by this Henry undertook yet another invasion himself, but he died suddenly in 1422. He has left a great reputation as a warrior. Otherwise he did very little as king of England; he could not raise one pound without consent of Parliament, he had to pawn his jewels to pay his troops regularly, and the anxieties of war were too great even for him. He created a halo of glory for the Lancastrian name, which dazzled men's eyes and made them forget the murder of Richard. He will be always celebrated because of that noble speech which Shakespeare puts into his mouth just before the battle of Agincourt; he really did make some such speech, trusting that the God of battles would give him the victory, and boasting that the fewer men there were to fight, the greater would be their share of honour; Shakespeare took his real words and turned them into a long speech in blank verse. By this speech he will always live.

The methods of fighting had slightly altered since Crecy. Armour had become much heavier; in fact no chain-armour was worn at Agincourt except a little round the throat, and after Agincourt even that was superseded by a solid gorget. As a result the chief weapon of offence was a short heavy axe with which a knight hewed at his enemy. Arrows glanced off plate armour. But an archer, being armourless, could move quickly, and therefore when he dropped his bow and took to his side-arm, a heavy mallet, he might still prove the better man. A new weapon came into use for non-archer foot, namely the bill, a long pole with a blade and crook, with which a man could both push and strike.

In this reign Parliament, jealous as ever of foreigners having power in England, suppressed the "alien priories," that is to say religious houses of foreign monks dependent upon some mother-house or monastery in France or Burgundy.

HENRY VI, 1422—1461

SIEGE OF ORLEANS, 1428, 1429.

LOSS OF NORMANDY, 1450

WARS OF THE ROSES BEGIN, 1455.

WAKEFIELD, 1460. TOWTON, 1461.

Henry VI was a baby a few months old and as the mad king of France soon died, he was nominally king of both countries. John, Duke of Bedford, his uncle, was regent for him for thirteen years. The Dauphin, who of course claimed to be the true King of France in spite of the Treaty of Troyes, continued the struggle, and the French to the south of the Loire supported him. But the baby was acknowledged at Paris, and Bedford with a mixed army of English and Burgundians won more battles; he cut to pieces the French and Scots at Verneuil in Normandy. The war dragged on, and in 1428 the celebrated siege of Orleans began. In the course of the siege a small party of English under Sir John Fastolfe was bringing up a convoy of provisions to the besiegers, when some French suddenly attacked him at Rouvray; Fastolfe formed a laager of his waggons and beat them off; this is known as the battle of the Herrings, for the provisions of which he was in charge were chiefly fish.

Advent of the Maid of Orleans. It was extremely important for the French to save Orleans; placed on the right bank of the river Loire just where it makes a great bend and comes nearest to Paris, it controlled the river valley. Now we first hear of that wonderful woman Joan of Arc. She came from Domremi in the east of France. She had had visions from heaven, and it was to promise him the aid of heaven that she came to Charles. Her appearance gave to the French just the enthusiasm and belief in themselves which were lacking, for they could always outnumber the English. When she had been once recognised by Charles, she rode at the head of the troops dressed in armour, and inspired them with new hopes, and so irresistible was the spirit of her men that Orleans was saved. Then she won a battle close by at Patay, where Fastolfe was beaten and Lord Talbot taken prisoner. Soon she conducted Charles to Reims, where he was crowned as Charles VII.

After a year of excitement it is not very surprising that Joan lost her popularity. Men's minds soon change, and it was not long before the heroine with a divine mission came to be regarded as a witch. The study of such revulsion of feeling is not work for the ordinary historian; human nature baffles explanation. We must content ourselves with the simple assertion that Joan's spell ceased. She was finally captured by the Burgundians, handed over to the English and burnt as a witch at Rouen in 1431, while Charles and the French made not an effort to save her. He could have exchanged her for English prisoners, or threatened to burn them if the English touched her. But his cowardly desertion is beyond excuse, the Burgundians and the French of their party were more eager for her death than even the English; the English who burnt her were at least her open enemies.

Final loss of Normandy and Gascony. She had not lived and died in vain. Yet it was not till another twenty years that the English were finally driven out of France. Henry V had so thoroughly conquered Normandy that, even after the relief of Orleans, the English rule there seemed quite secure. But the Normans were ready to turn against the English whenever they had the chance. Bedford died in 1435. His successor, his brother Humphrey of Gloucester, managed badly and offended the Burgundians who in their turn were reconciled to the French. Paris rose against Henry in 1436. Yet even then it was not till 1449 and 1450 that the combined French and Burgundians captured one by one the chief towns of Normandy. In the south the last battle was fought in 1453, not far from Bordeaux, at Châtillon. By this time the English held not a single place on French soil except Calais. The fact was that they had not enough men to hold their own.

Rise of the power of Burgundy. It will be easily understood that the Duke of Burgundy gained very great power as the price of his help to Charles and became practically an independent prince. Not only Artois and a good deal of north France were given up to the Duke, but also in various other ways, by marriage and purchase, nearly all the Netherlands came to him. Holland, Antwerp, Flanders, Brabant, Hainault, Namur and Luxemburg became the Burgundian Netherlands, though the great trading cities maintained their rights of self-government.

Civil war brewing in England. Turned out of France, and therefore left with nothing to do, the war-loving nobles very naturally turned to fighting each other in England. They thus satisfied their love of excitement and gave their followers something to do. It was a period of much disorder in England, mutual abuse as to who was responsible for failure in France, and private feuds between one noble and another. Thus the loss of Normandy was a cause of the Wars of the Roses. But it must be remembered that these wars concerned two parties of nobles who fought and killed each other, while the bulk of the people of England were not profoundly interested in what was going on. There was much discontent and anger because France had been lost, and this first led to a rising of peasants in Kent under Jack Cade. Like Wat Tyler he was suppressed. But during both the long French war and the civil war now beginning the peasants gained more and more strength.

King's College Chapel, Cambridge

St Albans: Wakefield: Towton. Richard, Duke of York, was grandson of a younger brother of John of Gaunt, but through his mother Anne Mortimer he was descended from Lionel who had been the middle brother between the Black Prince and John of Gaunt. He was regarded as Henry VI's heir. But when at last a son was born to Henry and his French wife Margaret of Anjou, Englishmen saw that there was no chance of the feeble government being improved. War actually began in 1455 when Richard took Henry prisoner at St Albans. It appeared as if there would be no more trouble. But Queen Margaret collected her supporters in the north and overwhelmed the Yorkists at Wakefield in Yorkshire; Richard was slain, and with him his chief noble, the Earl of Salisbury, 1460.

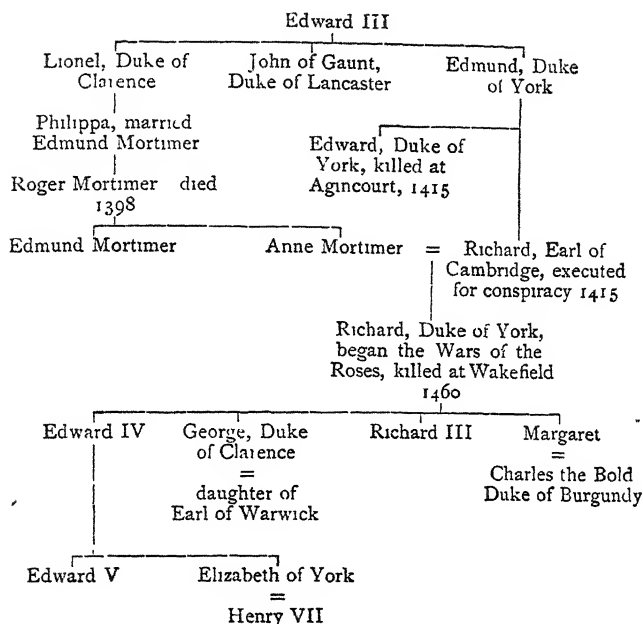

The new leader of the party was York's son Edward; his great supporter was Salisbury's son, Richard Neville, who by right of his wife was Earl of Warwick and is always known as the King-Maker. After the great defeat of Wakefield Margaret and the Lancastrians marched on London, greatly offending the country people by plundering as they came. Warwick tried to stop their advance and was beaten in the second battle of St Albans. But young Edward reached London first, and so great was the hatred of the Londoners and the south of England in general against Margaret that in this very moment of defeat he was chosen as king under the title of Edward IV. Finally the Lancastrians retreated north again; Edward and Warwick pursued, came up with them near York, and cut them to pieces at Towton, 1461. Henry VI was not captured at once, but we count the reign of Edward IV as beginning in this year¹.

¹ Map, p. 277.

Magdalen College, Oxford

HOUSE OF MORTIMER—YORK

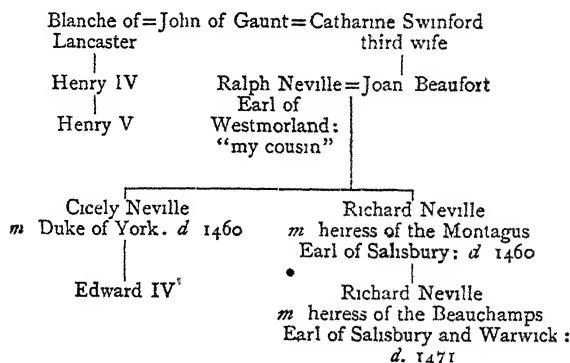

Artistic and Social improvement. The period of the Wars of the Roses is not only a long tale of dreary fighting. With Henry VI, as with the feeble Henry III, we associate a great foundation, he created the King's College at Cambridge and Eton College. The Perpendicular style of architecture was coming in. As the word suggests, in place of high-pitched pointed arches we now find the work carried out in long straight lines. In some buildings the effect is ugly, but at least the new style admitted more air and light. The perpendicular towers of Magdalen College at Oxford, founded by Bishop Waynflete, and of Gloucester Cathedral, are beautiful. St George's Chapel at Windsor was entirely rebuilt in this style; and Henry VII built the chapel which bears his name at Westminster for the Knights of the Order of the Bath, as St George's had been built for the use of the older Order of the Garter.

As we said before, these wars hardly touched the life of the common people of England. Except when one of the rival armies passed by, as when Margaret marched on London after the battle of Wakefield, neither countryfolk nor townsfolk cared to take sides; on that occasion they supported Edward because Margaret's soldiers plundered. Similarly we shall find them quite ready to acknowledge Henry VII after Bosworth. All that they wanted was peace and security. In the country villeinage had practically died out, in spite of the Statute of Labourers; even before the Black Death of 1348 the peasants had been prospering, and, though both Wat Tyler and Jack Cade had been crushed, the cause for which they rose, the freedom of the peasantry, was won.

PEDIGREE OF THE KING-MAKER.

HOUSE OF YORK, 1461—1485

EDWARD IV, 1461—1483

TOWTON, 1461

BARNET, 1471.

TREATY OF PECQUIGNY, 1475.

RICHARD III, 1483—1485

BOSWORTH, 1485.

The king and the king-maker. The victory of Edward IV made him really popular. Every Englishman who loved peace and quiet, the middle classes, the peasants and artisans, wanted a king who could really rule. Thus though he got his throne by might and claimed it by right of primogeniture from Edward III, he was much more king by the general wish of the people that he should be king, a wish which now-a-days we call Public Opinion. But for the time being Warwick appeared to be a much stronger man than he. Warwick the King-Maker is also called the Last of the Barons, that is to say the last of the great nobles who by their private wealth and the soldiers that they raised and paid, by the power of vast estates and hosts of friends and retainers, were as strong as or stronger than the king himself. Warwick was surrounded by a court more brilliant than the king's. His badge, the Bear and Ragged Staff, was displayed more than the Royal Arms. Either king or earl would have to give way. There was no room in England for both. A quarrel arose when Warwick wished Edward to marry a French princess, and Edward pleased himself by marrying an English lady, Elizabeth Woodville.

Edward's brother Clarence had married Warwick's daughter. So it was a good opportunity for Warwick to seek to revenge himself on the king by setting up Clarence against him. There were various ups and downs in the struggle which followed. First Warwick fled to Calais of which he was governor. Then he returned, and it was now Edward who fled and sought the protection of the Duke of Burgundy. But Warwick did not after all make Clarence king, and was foolish enough to restore Henry VI who had been in the Tower. There was very little love lost between Warwick and the Lancastrians, for such old enemies were naturally suspicious of each other. Edward returned, Clarence deserted to him, and at Barnet, just north of London, Warwick was defeated and slain. The same year Queen Margaret made a last effort, but was beaten at Tewkesbury at the junction of the Severn and the Avon. Margaret's son was murdered, next poor Henry was murdered, and, to complete the tale of slaughter, Clarence was afterwards murdered.

Home and Foreign Policy. After all these horrors Edward ruled undisputed, and not unpopular, for another twelve years. We can hardly admire him so much in his hour of vengeance as we admired him before in the Towton campaign. Yet he did good to England by bringing in an era of peace and of strong monarchical rule—an era commonly known as that of the "New Monarchy." This strong monarchy however had its bad points, as was evident when Edward chose to raise money by forced loans or benevolences in place of grants by Parliament. He made alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, Charles the Bold, and gave to him his sister in marriage. He was made a Knight of the Golden Fleece, the famous Burgundian order of chivalry, and the Royal Arms of England may still be seen suspended among those of the knights of the order in the churches of Ghent and Bruges. You will remember that the Duchy of Burgundy had grown so strong as to become almost a rival of the Kingdom of France. It was thought that England and Burgundy were going to combine again for a new French war. But Edward drew back from this. He took an army over to France, only to make a treaty at once at Pecquigny on the Somme. Before long Charles the Bold was engaged in a war with the Swiss, by whom he was badly beaten and slain, as we read in Sir Walter Scott's Anne of Geierstein. The king of France was Louis XI, a clever intriguer, whose policy was to defeat his enemies by raising up other enemies against them. He got back the Duchy of Burgundy itself for France on Charles' death, and ruled over a France really strong and united. His character has been maligned in another of Scott's novels, Quentin Durward. The Burgundian Netherlands, by the marriage of Charles the Bold's daughter Mary, passed under the control of Austria.

End of the House of York. Edward IV was succeeded by his little son Edward V. But the boy's uncle, Richard Duke of Gloucester, was resolved to secure the throne for himself, and became king by the support of the Londoners as the notorious Richard III. He was an energetic king, and living at a period when might was right, he was not much worse than either Henry IV or Edward IV. He endeavoured to render his position secure by murdering the two little princes, Edward V and his younger brother, in the Tower, the crime was kept quite secret, and for long nobody really knew that it had been committed. Nor were they his only victims: just as Edward IV had had to suppress Warwick, and Henry IV to fight against the Percies, so Richard III executed the Duke of Buckingham who had been his chief supporter and had won for him the throne.

But the story of civil war and conspiracy and murder is now coming to an end. Henry Tudor was the son of a Welsh baron by Margaret Beaufort, who was descended from John of Gaunt by his third wife, Catharine Swinford, thus he was the representative of the junior branch of the Lancastrian family, though there was something very strange in a Lancastrian claiming the throne through his mother. It little mattered now how anybody claimed the throne. Henry met and slew Richard III at Bosworth in Leicestershire. He then got a Parliament to declare him king. It was convenient to have the consent of Parliament. But it was conquest more than anything else that gave him his title to the throne; might was once more right. At the same time when we find king after king making Parliament sanction a successful revolt, even if it were a Parliament full of the rebel's own supporters, it was clear that a time would come when Parliament would award the throne in reality; but this did not occur till 1689. Between 1485 and 1689 there was indeed trouble about the succession, but no such war as that between Lancaster and York.

THE HOUSE OF TUDOR, 1485—1603

HENRY VII, 1485—1509

THE GREAT INTERCOURSE, 1496.

Henry VII was a strong king with Public Opinion at his back. There were risings against him, and two impostors caused some trouble. One was Lambert Simnel supposed to be the son of Clarence, and the other was Perkin Warbeck supposed to be the younger of the princes murdered in the Tower. Of the two Warbeck came the nearer to success when the men of Cornwall rose on his behalf, and he got aid from the Netherlands.

Strong Tudor Monarchical rule. Henry VII summoned few Parliaments. He raised forced loans or benevolences just like Edward IV. Moreover he had much private wealth, as he held all the estates of both the Houses of Lancaster and York. His minister Cardinal Morton is said to have invented a device for raising money called Morton's Fork; a rich man was told that he had better spend less money on show, and so pay the king's loans; a thrifty man that of course he must have saved money, and so could afford to pay. At any rate the king always had enough money. He also steadily set himself to suppress liveries and badges; he would not allow any noble to keep armed retainers, wearing his own uniform or livery, and mounting his badge. This had been the great curse of England from the time of the Hundred Years' War, and it was now put down for ever. The noble families had been much thinned out as well as weakened financially by the Wars of the Roses, and were in no position to assert themselves against the Crown. One of Henry's warmest supporters, the Earl of Oxford, who had been a devoted Lancastrian, was heavily fined for keeping retainers. If a king means to be king, he is compelled to punish even his friends, however ungrateful such treatment may appear. But Henry merely fined Oxford. Sir William Stanley, one of his most energetic warriors at Bosworth, he found himself obliged to execute for complicity with Warbeck.

The most famous institution of this reign is the Court of the Star Chamber. It was really a sort of committee of the king's Privy Council, and was composed of strong judges appointed by the crown with full power to try important cases without juries. Its chief duties were to supplement the ordinary law wherever that was gravely defective, as for instance in regard to libel, and to overawe nobles and others who could not be controlled by the ordinary courts. Such a court under a strong and upright king would be most beneficent, under a tyrant it might well become the instrument of his tyranny. The Star Chamber contributed to make the crown stronger, but in succeeding reigns it became very unpopular, though it certainly helped to keep England quiet and peaceful.

Thus the Tudors were the strongest line of kings since the days of the Great Charter, for even Edward I had been successfully thwarted by his barons, Edward III and Henry V had been great warriors, but had been restrained by Parliament at home, and the open attempt of Richard II to overawe opposition by a bodyguard of archers had been a failure. Edward IV, it is true, had been a really strong king; but though "the New Monarchy" began, as we have said, with the House of York, the most conspicuous of the new monarchs were the Tudors. Notice that, as the nobles were so weak, Henry gained his purpose without having to maintain any permanent army. The peasantry and farming classes were extremely prosperous in this reign and freer than before from the aggravating interference of powerful neighbouring landowners. One of our chief historians¹ says that the 15th and early 16th centuries may be called "the

Long Melford Church, Suffolk

Golden Age of the English labourer." Another² says that the townfolk were equally flourishing, and both the wool trade and the wool manufacture were in full swing. This prosperity was very apparent in Norfolk and Suffolk, where you can still see many fine churches which were entirely rebuilt at this period by the prosperous wool-merchants. We have already mentioned Henry VII's Chapel at Westminster. His mother, Margaret Beaufort, founded both Christ's College and St John's College at Cambridge, her name is preserved by the Lady Margaret Professorship, and by other institutions at Cambridge.

¹ Professor Thorold Rogers.

² Mrs J. R. Green.

Treaty with the Austrian Netherlands. To understand the foreign policy of Henry VII it is necessary to remember that Edward IV had been the ally of the Duke of Burgundy, Charles the Bold. The daughter of this Charles, Mary of Burgundy, was married to the Emperor Maximilian, of the Hapsburg dynasty of Austria, so that now the Burgundian Netherlands had become Austrian. It was natural enough for this Austrian House to support the impostor Perkin Warbeck who pretended to be Edward IV's son. But it was soon seen that whoever was Lord of Flanders, and whatever his nationality, he ought to be the ally of the king of England, whether Yorkist or Tudor, for the sake of the wool trade. So in 1496 a treaty of commercial alliance was made between Henry and Austria; it was called the Great Intercourse; England and Flanders were to trade freely and help each other to suppress piracy, while Perkin Warbeck was disowned.

Rise of the Power of Spain. Philip, son of Maximilian and Mary, married Joanna, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. In previous reigns Spain had not been very important in comparison with the other nations of Europe. But Ferdinand and Isabella did a very great deal: they united the two separate kingdoms of Castile and Aragon; they established a strong and well organized standing army, and successfully fought the Moors of Granada. The capture of Granada in 1492 broke the power of the Mohammedans in Spain. In their reign also was first established a Spanish Inquisition against the Jews and Moors. Spain and the Netherlands being thus united by marriage, Henry of England saw the advantage of allying himself with both; in 1501 he married his eldest son Arthur, Prince of Wales, to Catharine, younger daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella¹. The young Prince soon died, and then Henry tried to arrange a marriage between Catharine and his second son Henry, but the plan was not immediately carried out. Another but equally important marriage was that between his daughter Margaret and James IV of Scotland in 1503. Of course at this date all such marriages had great political importance, and no doubt it was hoped that a marriage between the ruling families of Scotland and England would tend to weaken the hereditary alliance, now two centuries old, between Scotland and France.

From Medieval to Modern History. During this reign the Portuguese, who had for a century past been working down the coast of West Africa, turned the Cape and sailed direct to the East Indies. Christopher Columbus discovered the West India islands. Modern history has therefore now begun with a boundless prospect of wealth and adventure across the Indian and Atlantic oceans. Add to this that France and Spain are each of them united under a powerful monarchy, no longer a mass of little separate states, that the art of printing has been invented; that the use of gunpowder is leading to practical results, necessitating the scientific training of drilled national armies; that the revival of classical learning, the Renaissance, is active in Italy and ready to extend its influence into northern countries. We see that we have left behind us the Middle Ages.

¹ See p. 202 for the Burgundian-Spanish pedigree

HENRY VIII, 1509—1547

FLODDEN, 1513.

SOLWAY MOSS, 1542.

BATTLE OF PAVIA, 1525.

ACT OF APPEALS; CRANMER ARCHBISHOP, 1533.

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE MONASTERIES, 1536—1539.

Probably about no other king of England has there been such a great difference of opinion as about Henry VIII. To some writers he appears as the bluff, jovial, manly king Hal, handsome and athletic, and a clever scholar; to others he is the coarse and brutal despot who thought of nobody and nothing but himself. But all agree that as he grew older he became more selfish, until he became a law unto himself and cared only to please himself. It was under such a man that the greatest revolution in all English history was brought about, a revolution of such importance that it required a tyrant, even a brutal tyrant, to accomplish it. His first act was to marry his brother's widow, Catharine of Aragon, having first obtained the proper dispensation or leave from the Pope. This marriage, it may be said, influenced the whole course of the reign.

War against Scotland and France. Henry joined his allies in a war against France. The only noticeable action was a skirmish dignified by the name of the battle of the Spurs in north France, at which some French cavalry were seized with sudden panic and ran away. More important was an invasion of the Scots into Northumberland, for, in spite of the marriage of James IV with Henry's sister, the hereditary alliance between Scotland and France still held good. The Scots crossed the Tweed at the ford of Coldstream about sixteen miles up from Berwick, and posted themselves upon a ridge of hills called Flodden Edge. The English leader, the Earl of Surrey, marched right round them and cut them off from Coldstream. They came down to Flodden Field upon a lower slope, so that it came about that they fought with their faces towards Scotland. Though their left wing was successful, their centre and right were driven in and surrounded by the combined English bowmen and billmen; James IV and the flower of his nobility were slain, 1513. But except for some plundering raids into Scotland the English army did not follow up the victory.

Surrey belonged to an old family of Norfolk, the Howards, his father, on marriage with the heiress of the Mowbrays, had been created Duke of Norfolk, but the dukedom was forfeited when he fell leading Richard's van at Bosworth. It was restored to Surrey after Flodden. Both this title and the Earl Marshalship of England still belong to the Howard family, and the present duke officiated as Earl Marshal at the coronation of both Edward VII and George V. The Howards had been frequently admirals of the eastern fleets under Edward III, and Surrey's son who fought under him at Flodden was "admiral," as Scott tells us in Marmion.

Cardinal Wolsey and the Reformation. The most important man of the reign, though of humble birth, was Cardinal Wolsey, Archbishop of York and Chancellor. Henry at first let him do almost what he pleased both at home and abroad. Under him Parliament was hardly ever called, and money was raised by forced loans. The Pope made him Cardinal and Legate, and with such powers he could do almost what he liked in the Church in England. He was very extravagant and fond of display, for which he needed money; he himself held a great number of places or benefices in the church, and such a man we call a pluralist. His ambition was so notorious that in the play of Henry VIII a celebrated speech against it as his worst vice has been put into his mouth. But for all his ambition he was very clear-sighted. One of his chief ideas seems to have been to reform the Church in England in such a way that the great Protestant Revolution might not spread from

Christ Church, Oxford

Germany to England. It was in 1517 that Luther first attacked the Roman Church when he nailed up against the door of the Castle Church at Wittenberg in Saxony his protest against the sale of Indulgences by agents of the Pope. In England Wolsey's first step was to suppress some of the smaller monasteries. He founded a celebrated college at Oxford which is now called Christ Church, and its crest is still a red cardinal's hat, a low hat with very wide brim and two strings ending in tassels. He also founded a school

Hampton Court, built by Wolsey, surrendered to Henry VIII. The gardens were laid out in Dutch style for William III at Ipswich, his native town. All this meant that he would fight against Protestantism, not by means of the old fashioned monks, but by men educated at good schools and colleges. We have seen that colleges had been founded by William of Wykeham, Henry VI, Bishop Waynflete, Lady Margaret Beaufort, and many others during the last 150 years, and thus Wolsey was so far doing nothing new. But he was the first to suppress English monasteries¹. He was also ambitious to become Pope, and doubtless, if elected, would have used his powers for the same purpose, to control the Reformation.

Military Ascendancy of Spain. We saw how in the last reign the crowns of Castile and Aragon were united by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella, and how these rulers had conquered Granada. Their grandson inherited from them Spain and all the conquests of Spain, both in Italy and in the New World; through his other two grandparents he was master of the Netherlands and Archduke of Austria; by election he became Emperor. He is always known as Charles V, but in Spain he was Charles I. Of all his dominions the Netherlands were the richest, Spain the strongest. Spain was the first country in which was established a standing army of a modern type, regularly trained, and kept up to full strength by constant reinforcements from its recruiting centres. But at most it was only 12,000 strong. The new firearms were greatly improved by the Spaniards, and with them modern warfare may be said to begin. The rest of Charles's dominions were too cumbrous and scattered, so that his power appeared to be more formidable than it really was. Following the old English policy of alliance with the master of the Netherlands, Henry had married his brother Arthur's widow who was Charles's aunt, Catharine of Aragon. Wolsey favoured alliance with Spain. But in 1525 the Spanish army won such a crushing victory over the French at Pavia in north Italy that Henry and Wolsey began to fear the growth of Spain. Accordingly they changed their policy, believing that it would not be wise to allow their old enemy France to become too weak and their ally Spain too strong. Thus it was owing to English influence that the French king, Francis I, who had been taken prisoner at Pavia, was released. This principle, of making alliances in order to prevent the predominance in Europe of any one state, is known as the principle of the Balance of Power.

¹ See p. 180 for suppression of alien monasteries.

The legality of Catharine's marriage. Henry had had to get a special dispensation from Rome to marry his brother's widow. They had several children, but of these only one, the Princess Mary, survived, and she was weak and ailing. No man can really understand another man's motives. But it would be hard not to believe that when Henry's conscience pricked him for having married his brother's widow, and when he thought that the death of his children was a judgment from heaven upon his marriage, he was deceiving both himself and others; he had fallen in love with Anne Boleyn, and wanted to believe that he ought to be divorced from Catharine. At the same time he was becoming cold towards Charles V, Catharine's nephew. Cardinal Wolsey's policy is also somewhat puzzling. Did he really wish that Henry should be divorced, or did he say so to please him? At any rate Wolsey, if in favour of the divorce, wished it to be obtained from the only power which men of that day considered to be competent to give it, namely the reigning pope. It was not easy to persuade a pope to annul what a previous pope had specially permitted. Moreover Charles V had just then entered Rome in triumph, and Pope Clement was a prisoner in his hands.

Another cardinal was sent to England to try the divorce question together with Wolsey. The queen appealed to Rome, and the two cardinals let the case go back to Rome. This at once led to Wolsey's downfall. Henry thought that he could have pronounced the divorce if he had wished, and no doubt Wolsey would have been in favour of it if Henry had then been willing to marry a French princess. But with Henry it was Anne or nobody. It was not very difficult to accuse the cardinal of treason under the old statute of Praemunire of Edward III's reign. He was stripped of his benefices, and finally he died on his way to trial. The chief existing memorial of Wolsey is Hampton Court, which he surrendered to Henry when he lost his favour, and it is now a royal palace.

Thomas Cromwell and Thomas Cranmer. Henry's new counsellor was Thomas Cromwell, and it is he to whom Wolsey is supposed to make his famous speech referred to above:

"Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition.
... .. O Cromwell, Cromwell,
Had I but served my God with half the zeal
I served my King, he would not in mine age
Have left me naked to mine enemies"

His sister was great-grandmother of Oliver Cromwell. He seemed to be ready to do anything for Henry, however unpleasant. Another adviser was Thomas Cranmer, a Cambridge man; and he too was remarkably pliant to the king's will. He advised an appeal to the doctors of law in the various Universities of Europe. Here again is a difficulty, for it is hard to see by what right a professor of law can decide a question of religion, and till then nobody had questioned that marriage and divorce were religious questions, such as only a pope could decide. Henry now wanted to argue that the pope who had permitted him to marry Catharine had no right to grant the permission. What would have happened if the Reformation had not been successful in Germany no one can say. But Luther had shown the way to defy Rome. If Luther could challenge papal doctrines, Henry could disown papal supremacy in England.

Parliament: the break with Rome. Henry was a remarkably strong king, chiefly owing to his father's methods and institutions. He had no standing army to enforce his will, yet he did enforce it upon the nation. In 1529 he summoned a Parliament, which sat at intervals for seven years; the old system had been to dissolve each Parliament after a single session, and summon a new one when the next occasion required. Henry completely overawed this Parliament, though it is quite possible that a great many of its members were only too glad to plunder the Church. Under Henry's direction they attacked the clerical courts, the custom of paying the first-fruits to Rome, the right of appealing to Rome, and so on; to put it shortly, Parliament carried out the king's wishes, step by step, in denying all political power to Rome in England. The Act in restraint of Appeals in 1533—a far stronger act than Edward III's Praemunire—declared that no decision of an English court could be questioned abroad. Just at this time the Archbishop of Canterbury died. Henry promptly nominated Cranmer, the pope recognised him, and Cranmer held a court at Dunstable at which he pronounced, not that Catharine could be divorced, but that she had never been legally married to Henry. He had already by this time married Anne Boleyn.

Two important Acts of Parliament followed. The Act of Supremacy declared Henry Supreme Head of the Church in England, thus definitely repudiating the claims of the Pope. The first-fruits were naturally enough claimed for the king. He had undisputed power to nominate his own bishops; a form was maintained by which the cathedral clergy were supposed to be free to elect, but as a matter of fact neither then nor ever since has the sovereign's choice of a bishop been disputed. The other was the Act of Succession, by which the throne was conferred upon Anne Boleyn's child Elizabeth. An oath was demanded from those in authority to recognise Henry as the Supreme Head, and Elizabeth as heiress. Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher of Rochester were executed for refusing to take the oath.

Igham Moat, Kent

More had been chancellor since Wolsey's fall, and is celebrated for his book Utopia, an account of an imaginary No-man's-land where the government is perfectly ordered and all people are virtuous and happy, in contrast with the existing state of England. He, and Erasmus, and Dean Colet, the founder of St Paul's School, are known as the Oxford Reformers; their aim had been to effect a Reformation of the Church from within, not to attack it violently as Luther did from without.

The state of the Monasteries. Then Henry and Cromwell proceeded to attack the monasteries. There were a very large number of religious houses belonging to various orders of monks or friars or nuns. Each monastery was governed by the rules of its own order. They were free from the ordinary discipline of the Church; that is to say they were governed by their own heads and not by the bishops of the dioceses; but they acknowledged the Pope as Supreme Head. Most monasteries were very wealthy, for during the course of centuries many men had bestowed lands upon them for the good of their souls. Very often the abbots and monks were good landlords, good practical farmers, and great breeders of sheep for the wool market. This is particularly true of the Cistercians, to whom belonged some of those abbeys of which the ruins are so much admired to-day by travellers and tourists, such as Fountains in Yorkshire and Tintern on the Wye. On the whole these monks were popular with their neighbours to whom they brought wealth. But other houses, especially those in the towns, stood quite apart from the general life of the people. In the past they had done a great deal for education, but at this period newer ideas of education had been spreading. There was also much jealousy between the monks and the parish priests, in some villages the parish church was in the hands of a neighbouring monastery. But the monks' greatest enemies were the landowners, who grudged them their wealth and coveted their lands. It is beyond doubt that in many cases the monasteries were not half full, perhaps some forty or fifty monks living where 300 years earlier there might have been two hundred. Also laziness and lack of education were far too common. They lived too much out of sight, and what we do not see we are apt to think must be very wicked.

The Dissolution of the Monasteries. Henry appointed commissioners to go round and examine the monasteries. He expected these men to make a report against them, and naturally enough a strong report was sent in accusing them of all sorts of wickedness. The monks and nuns were said to have confessed to such wickedness; doubtless they had had a hint that if they confessed they would be treated leniently. At any rate the commissioners' report gave Henry and Cromwell the opportunity to carry through in 1536 an Act of Parliament suppressing the smaller monasteries. Later—in 1539—the larger houses, which were the better conducted, were also swept away. Several abbots who refused to turn out were hanged. Somewhat scanty pensions were given to the homeless refugees. But there are glaring cases of monks, who were considered to be far too wicked to remain monks, yet who on giving up their monasteries and lands were promptly appointed to be cathedral clergy. The Pilgrimage of Grace is the name we give to a rising in the northern counties in favour of the monasteries; the insurgents were quieted by fair words, but afterwards very many were executed without mercy.

What Happened to Monastery Lands. With the confiscated lands of some monasteries Henry created six new bishoprics. But most of the estates were given or sold to favourites; the Russell family obtained Woburn in

Camber Castle in Sussex, near Rye; one of Henry VIII's forts for coast-defence

Bedfordshire, Tavistock in Devon, and a convent near London of which the name survives to-day in Covent Garden. The men who got all this new wealth were mostly of new families, that is to say their ancestors had not been prominent barons in preceding reigns, though often of Norman descent. There is no need for us to accuse them all of unrighteous dealings in thus accepting what was mere plunder. The Russells have done far more good to England at large, and to the farmers of Bedfordshire and Devon in particular, than the monks whom they turned out, for they have always been good and practical patrons of farming. But theirs is a somewhat rare case. Much of the money with which Henry thus enriched himself was devoted to the needs of the navy and to coast defence; the abbey bells were melted down for cannons, and the lead stripped off the roofs was converted into ammunition. Schools for pilots were founded, as at Deptford; it is said that the clever seamanship of Elizabeth's sailors was first learnt here. But when we have said this, it remains that the confiscation carried out by Cromwell was bad in itself and promoted a bad spirit of greed.

"The Great Harry"

The Question of Religious Doctrine. Lastly, Henry forced through Parliament The Six Articles. He had himself taken the place of the Pope, and objected to freedom of thought in matters of doctrine. By this Act, which was simply Henry's own will imposed upon the nation, belief was required in six things: Transubstantiation, the actual change of the bread and wine into Christ's Body and Blood; Communion in one kind, that is bread only for the laity, the wine being reserved for the priests; Prayers for the dead; Confession to priests; Celibacy of the clergy; the Duty of observing their Vows incumbent on monks and nuns. Cranmer put away his wife in obedience to Henry's decree.

Henry's Marriages . Fall of Cromwell. It was not long before Henry tired of the frivolous Anne Boleyn, got Cranmer to divorce her, beheaded her, and married Jane Seymour. Jane had a son Edward and died. Some time later Cromwell persuaded him to marry a German princess, Anne of Cleves, with a view to forwarding an alliance with the minor German sovereigns who were opposed to Charles V. This lady was not beautiful enough to please Henry, and Cranmer had to be again called in to pronounce a divorce. The king's anger was very bitter and serious against Cromwell. Parliament slavishly passed an Act of Attainder, on a trumped-up accusation of treason, against Cromwell; that is to say, it was declared by Act of Parliament that Cromwell's blood was tainted and that he was unfit to live. Such a process, though carried out by Commons and Lords and sanctioned by the Crown, is nothing more or less than a denial of justice. Cromwell was very unpopular, though he had enriched many men by abbey lands, and there can have been few to pity him. He had served Henry for a time, sometimes in unpleasant ways, and Henry threw him over when he had no more need of him. Next Henry married Catharine Howard of the noble family of Norfolk, procured her divorce through Cranmer, and sent her to be beheaded. Lastly he married Catharine Parr, a lady of really fine character, who was able to manage him, and outlived him ; we chiefly commend her because she alone treated with kindness the unhappy Princess Mary.

Later Policy: Scotland and France. In connection with these marriages, and especially the Cleves and Howard marriages, political questions came up. The relatives of each wife or the supporters of each marriage had their own views of politics, and wanted to get their own rewards from the king. You will remember that the divorce of Catharine of Aragon followed after Henry's breaking off his alliance with Spain, because the Spanish army had been winning victories over the French, and thus threatening to disturb the "Balance of Power." The English in general did not like the break with Spain, for there was much trade both with that country and with the Spanish Netherlands. Moreover Henry was quite inconsistent; Spain, France, the German Princes, were sought as allies by him in turn, and deserted in turn. Alliance with England was not greatly valued at this date. We had no standing army such as Spain had ; the nobles were no longer allowed to keep retainers, and in consequence Henry had no good troops ; levies of militia from the counties were untrained mobs without discipline. Moreover when Henry did collect an army it was armed in the old fashion with bills and bows, good enough to fight the Scots at Flodden, but not to face the trained musketeers of Spain, if such a need had arisen. Of one such army a foreign critic said that the only good soldiers were the Northern Horse, who had had much experience in border raids.

At the end of the reign Henry fought France once more and captured Boulogne. But the army chiefly distinguished itself by pitiless plundering. A French fleet came to Spithead, but was unable to effect a landing. An invasion of Scotland led to the rout at Solway Moss of James V, son of the James killed at Flodden and of Henry's sister Margaret. He had done much to suppress the turbulent Scottish barons, and they in revenge gave him no support in this disastrous battle. Solway Moss is at the western entrance to Scotland, just beyond the Border. James V died soon afterwards, leaving Scotland to an infant, the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots. In the meanwhile the kingdom was governed by her widowed mother, Mary of Guise.

The Age of Explorations. The Portuguese had been engaged for a century in working down the west coast of Africa, and finally reached the Cape and India; the Spaniards, after the discoveries of Columbus, quickly conquered Cuba, Mexico and the Isthmus of Panama, and on the other side Peru and Chile. Pope Alexander VI drew a dividing line between the Portuguese and Spanish areas of conquest; it was finally fixed at what we should call 45° W. of Greenwich. The elbow of Brazil thus went to the Portuguese; it is worth remembering that owing to winds and currents a sailing ship could make a quicker passage to India by crossing first to Brazil and thence to the Cape. Meanwhile John Cabot, a Genoese of Bristol, had sailed in 1498 in search of a north-west passage to India round North America. He had previously discovered Newfoundland or some region in that neighbourhood earlier in the reign of Henry VII. His son Sebastian explored southwards for Henry VIII. Adventurers and fishermen were attracted to the cod-banks of the north. William Hawkins sailed into the south Atlantic. There were plenty of Englishmen alive to the importance of discovery, but their efforts were spasmodic. Meanwhile the chief centre of European trade was no longer Venice, nor any port of the Mediterranean; the commerce of Spain and Portugal was centred at Cadiz and Lisbon, thence was carried round by the Atlantic to Flanders, and from Antwerp on the tidal and deep Schelde was redistributed through Europe.

Wales and the Welsh Marches. You will remember that Edward I after annexing Llewelyn's principality created a few counties, yet without calling upon them to send members to Parliament; and that he had wished to suppress the rights to independence claimed by the lords marchers. The House of Lancaster possessed a great deal of land in the marches, especially Monmouth and Brecknock; the House of York, through the Mortimers, possessed also a great deal in the middle marches. All

Holbein's Earl of Surrey as type of costume during Henry's reign

Sir W. Russell,
Elizabethan courtier

these were now in the hands of Henry VIII. So he was able to do what Edward I had wished; that is, he suppressed the special march rights. He created eight new counties, each, except Glamorgan, named after an important castle; these eight counties, the five of Edward's creation, and the county palatine of Chester, henceforward sent members to the House of Commons. To maintain order and prevent rebellion Henry greatly strengthened the Council of Wales, and gave it also power over the adjoining English counties. It met at Ludlow or Shrewsbury, and acted as a sort of Star Chamber for this district. Similarly when there occurred in Yorkshire the Roman Catholic rising, which was known as the Pilgrimage of Grace, he strengthened an older Court of the North, so as to make it also like the Star Chamber.

War in Ireland: Title of King. Henry VII had by an act, called Poynings' Law from his deputy in Ireland, Sir Edward Poynings, made the English Council and the English Parliament supreme over the Parliament in Dublin. But only a small district round Dublin within what was called the English Pale was really subject to England. The native Irish and the Anglo-Norman chieftains descended from Strongbow's comrades were independent, yet quite unable to unite and form a national government. Henry VIII began a policy of war and conquest, especially against the Fitzgeralds. But he fell between two stools; he should have fought more strenuously, which meant greater expense than he felt that he could afford, or not at all. He was the first to call himself King of England and Ireland.

Social Revolution in England. During all this reign England had been getting gradually into a very bad condition. For one cause of this Henry's government was not responsible, namely the conversion of corn land into pasture. Much land which had been open to the use of the villagers was enclosed and taken by the lords as their own. For this the instinct which makes a man wish to gain wealth quickly was responsible. A great many men are required to plough and sow and cut corn on an estate, where a few shepherds would suffice to look after a large flock of sheep. The wool was very valuable, and could be worked into cloth in England or exported to Flanders. As a result more and more farm labourers were thrown out of work.

For the suppression of the monasteries and the granting of monastery lands to the king's favourites, many of them upstarts of humble birth who were in a hurry to get rich and were much more grasping as landlords than the old monks, Henry's government was directly responsible. Moreover when confiscation once begins there is no saying where it will stop, money can only be seized once, and therefore when more money is wanted it is necessary to find new lands to seize for new needs. There was a great deal of other Church property which could be confiscated, and steps were being taken to seize it when Henry died.

But one of the worst things for the prosperity of the country which Henry did was his debasement of the coinage. Base metal was mixed with silver, at first in small proportions; but here again it is difficult to stop when once an evil has begun, for it is so tempting to add just a little more bad metal and a little less silver at each new coinage. Nothing upsets the general security of trade more than bad money; neither buyer nor seller is satisfied. Finally even the actual harm done, the poverty caused by violent spoliation, is not so great an evil in itself as the spirit of grasping and restless greed which it encourages.

Poor relief had been almost entirely in the hands of the monasteries. After their dissolution a series of acts were passed which attempted to grapple with the problem, and especially with the dangers arising from the presence of many "valiant and sturdy beggars" who wandered over the country. The most systematic attempt to deal with poverty was the Poor Law enacted towards the end of Elizabeth's reign in 1601.

To counterbalance the harm that Henry did we find that he left behind him certain fortresses which made our southern coasts more secure, a few ships which were the nucleus of our modern Royal Navy, an improved artificial harbour at Dover, and a school for navigation. But to do this he exhausted the strength of England, for he did it by spending the capital of the country. The weakness of Edward VI and Mary, the glaring inequality between the great wealth of the few and the poverty of the many, the existence of the swarms of sturdy beggars, all this gives the answer to those who admire Henry as a strong patriotic king. Also it is absurd to suppose that all the treasure that he seized, for instance the many cartloads carried off from the shrines of Glastonbury and Canterbury, was spent on ships and forts. Yet the same historians who admire him sneer at Charles I, whose "iniquitous" ship-money was at least a tax upon national income and did not exhaust capital Henry had been allowed by Parliament to nominate his successors. He fixed the order, in case of each successor dying childless, thus: Edward, Mary, Elizabeth, the descendants of his sister Mary and the Duke of Suffolk, the descendants of Margaret and James IV of Scotland.

EDWARD VI, 1547—1553 .

Lord Protector Somerset: Pinkie. There was no dispute about the succession. Edward VI, son of Henry and Jane Seymour, born after the death of Catharine of Aragon, was at once accepted. He was ten years old, and his uncle Edward Seymour was Lord Protector with the title of Duke of Somerset. He was a steady and clear-headed man, but he was quite unable to control the Lords of the Privy Council, whose chief aim was to enrich themselves. His first object was to secure the betrothal of the boy king to the five-year-old queen of the Scots. He invaded Scotland along the coast road by way of Berwick and Dunbar, and beat the Scots at Pinkie, a few miles east of Edinburgh. The marriage was very much disliked in Scotland, and it was asked if Somerset would have desired it in the opposite case, that is if the lass had been English and the lad a Scot. The manner of the wooing was more objectionable still. So Mary was at once sent off to France and betrothed to the Dauphin.

Progress of the Reformation. The strong reformers now entirely got their own way. The confiscation of chantries, where masses were said for the souls of the dead, and to some of which were attached schools, had been threatened by Henry VIII; it was now carried out. Almost every village had for centuries past had a guild, that is a club to which the villagers contributed money as now to benefit societies, to secure themselves against sickness and old age, and for other purposes, such as feasting. Many churches had valuable plate and vestments. All such sources of wealth were now attacked. One of our chief historians¹ calls this the Great Spoliation, and says that it caused far more misery than the suppression of the monasteries. The general excuse was that the chantry priests were "meanly learned," and the money confiscated was to be spent upon good education. But whatever Somerset may have intended, very little indeed of the property went to either universities or schools. The King Edward VI schools, Shrewsbury, Sherborne, Birmingham and others, represent to-day a mere fraction of what might have been done. Somerset is himself not so much to be blamed, for he fell from power before the spoliation was complete. Yet he, too, acquired a piece of church land, and began to build a mansion where the present Somerset House now stands on the "Strand" between the Temple and Savoy House.

The reformation of doctrine was also taken in hand. We owe to this reign our Book of Common Prayer. The violence of the reforming movement was such that no man could tell what he ought to believe. What the King ordered was true doctrine; but which King? Under Henry VIII all men were ordered to accept the Six Articles; to refuse to believe in prayers for the dead was treason. Now when a child was the supreme head of the Church, prayers for the dead were decreed to be wicked, and villagers were robbed of their guilds because they prayed for the dead. The mass was abolished, services were ordered to be read in English, pictures and windows to be destroyed, and the altar to be removed from the east end to the middle of the church and to be called a communion table. The clergy were allowed to marry, a thing forbidden by Henry VIII. But Somerset and his party were not eager persecutors; even the strong Roman Catholic Bishops, Gardiner and Bonner, were not executed, but only imprisoned.

¹ Dr Augustus Jessopp.

Peasant Revolts: Somerset removed. Somerset's chief opponent was the Earl of Warwick, of the family of Dudley. He thought that Somerset was going too slowly and intrigued against him. Two revolts broke out. One was in Cornwall in favour of the old Church and the restoration of the mass. Lord Russell put down the rebels with considerable cruelty after a fierce fight near Exeter, at St Mary's Clyst, where the peasants with old-fashioned bows and bills were with difficulty defeated by foreign mercenaries. The other revolt was in Norfolk and Suffolk, and was caused rather by the enclosure of common lands than by the religious changes; Warwick suppressed the peasants with the same difficulty and the same severity on Mousehold hill just outside Norwich. These risings gave Warwick the excuse to turn against Somerset as far too mild a man to be regent. In 1549 Somerset was removed; and in 1552 he was executed, nominally on an obscure charge of treason, but really because he was becoming popular again.

Northumberland and Lady Jane Grey. The Earl of Warwick was now made Duke of Northumberland. His son Guilford Dudley was married to Lady Jane Grey, cousin of King Edward and grand-daughter of Mary Tudor and the Duke of Suffolk. Northumberland is certainly one of the most unpleasant figures in history. He was most conspicuous of all those who disgraced the Reformation by making it an excuse for plunder. Had Somerset been stronger he would have used the property confiscated from the church for the benefit of education and religion, or at least a certain proportion of it; it was under Northumberland that this booty was finally left in the hands of the unscrupulous few. He lost Boulogne to the French. He debased the coinage further. Finally he persuaded Edward, then sixteen years old, to declare Lady Jane his successor. Parliament had allowed Henry VIII to nominate his successors; but Edward and Northumberland had no legal power to alter the order fixed. If Henry's order was wrong, and if neither Mary nor Elizabeth could be chosen because of disputes about their birth, Mary Queen of Scots was next in the direct succession, not Lady Jane.

Calvin and the Reformed Church. The Reformation entered upon its second stage in the middle of the century. Luther had attacked the right of any pope to sell, or even to grant, Indulgences, and had almost broken the religious supremacy of Rome north of the Alps. But he had not founded such a reformed system of church government and of doctrine as would be acceptable to Protestants of all nationalities. Henry VIII, backed by a subservient Parliament, had made himself the head of the Church of England, and had enforced the Six Articles. But the real creator of an organized Reformed Church was John Calvin of Geneva, whose idea was to go back to the pure simple teaching of the New Testament and create a Church according to what he believed was the system of the first apostles, a Church without bishops under the rule of presbyters or elders who were laymen, having authority to control the morals of the people and to enforce godliness; there were to be no symbols, such as images or crosses or the ring in marriage; no doctrines that had been added by Roman influence to the teaching of Christ and St Paul. These were the marks of the Eglise Réformée, the Presbyterian or Puritan Church, adopted by the Swiss of Geneva and the Protestant cantons, by the Huguenots of France, by some German states, and later by the Scots and the Dutch. In England it will be seen that the reformers of Edward VI's reign were partly influenced by Calvinism, partly by Henry VIII's views.

The Counter-Reformation. But in the meanwhile the Roman Catholics had rallied wonderfully. Seeing that the worldliness of the Church and the sales of Indulgences had given to Luther his first opportunity, the popes set to work to get rid of abuses, and devoted themselves to win back heretics by reform within the Church, and by persecution if need be. At least Spain was loyal to Rome, and had a strong army and the wealth of the Indies at her back. Protestantism was never very popular in France; in south and west Germany the tide was on the turn. A Council was held at Trent in the Austrian Tyrol, a town on the most important high road between Italy and Germany, where the methods to oppose Protestantism and to purify the Church were discussed. But the greatest instrument in the work of restoring the power of Rome was the Order of Jesus, founded by a Spaniard named Ignatius Loyola. The Jesuits were not ordinary priests under the control of bishops and cardinals. Their head was the General of their Order, and they were auxiliaries to the parish priests, missionaries who were sent to this or that place where their General thought they could do most good, to palaces or to cottages, where they could convert or confirm the learned and the unlearned. Enthusiasts for the Church were swept into their ranks. They were "all things to all men," and their preaching and teaching brought back thousands to the Roman communion. But there has been very much jealousy against them, and the common belief that they hold the doctrine that "the end justifies the means," that, for example, everything is lawful by which they could win men to Rome, has made them unpopular. The movement of reform within the Roman church is known as the Counter-Reformation. It was when this movement was in progress that Mary Tudor became Queen of England, and married the Roman Catholic Philip of Spain.

MARY, 1553—1558

FIRES OF SMITHFIELD AND OXFORD, 1555.

Lady Jane: Wyatt's Rebellion. When Edward died Northumberland's intrigue proved quite useless. His selfishness was too apparent. Mary received considerable support, and without fighting she was made Queen. Northumberland was executed, Guilford Dudley and Lady Jane were kept under restraint. Mary's chief adviser was the Spanish ambassador, by name Renard, and with his help she at once restored Gardiner and Bonner to their bishoprics, and imprisoned Cranmer and Latimer. She proclaimed the restoration of the mass and refused to acknowledge the married clergy. Renard proposed that she should marry Philip of Spain, son of Charles V. This led immediately to a rising in Kent, under Sir Thomas Wyatt, but Mary faced the danger boldly. Wyatt's troops deserted him and he was captured just outside London. The only result of the revolt was that Guilford Dudley and Lady Jane were executed, and even Elizabeth's life was for a time in danger.

The Marian Persecution. Mary now felt herself strong enough to declare openly for the old Church. Philip came to England in 1554, and the marriage was celebrated; but he was allowed no power as king consort. Next arrived in England Cardinal Pole, who was the grandson of Clarence the brother of Edward IV. He brought with him a papal absolution of the kingdom of England for the protestant acts of the last reign. Next year persecution began. A clergyman named Rogers was the first martyr, then followed Bishop Hooper of Gloucester, then Ridley and Latimer, who were burnt at Oxford, and finally Cranmer. At first Cranmer had recanted, but in any case Mary intended that he should die because it was he who had declared her mother's marriage illegal. There were not after all very many burnings, about three hundred in all. But the feelings of the nation were very strongly roused. If under Edward VI Protestantism was tainted by the "reformers'" love of spoliation, under Mary Romanism was identified with the horrible torture of burning. England rang with the words of Latimer: "We shall this day light a candle which by God's grace shall not be put out." But while Mary was, as it were, allowed by the leading men of England to restore the mass and to persecute bishops and other innocent persons, they showed her pretty clearly that they did not intend to allow her to restore any of the church lands or refound the monasteries. They were mean enough to let the earnest and pious men be burnt for their doctrines, while they kept for themselves the proceeds of the late spoliation.

The loss of Calais. The memory of Mary Tudor is always connected with the martyrdoms and with the loss of Calais. Alliance with Spain meant war with France, and the Duke of Guise captured the harbour and fortress which had been England's gateway into France, whether for wool or for armies, since 1347. Deserted by her husband Philip, childless, grieved to the heart by this last blow, she sank and died in the autumn of 1558. She had had a bitter and miserable girlhood; the hopes which she must have felt when first she came to the throne had been disappointed. She had not restored the Roman Church to its old estate, but had only burnt some of the best and most honest of her opponents. So we must leave her.

ELIZABETH, 1558—1603

- 1568. MARY STUART SEEKS REFUGE IN ENGLAND.
- 1578. DRAKE SAILS THROUGH THE STRAITS OF MAGELLAN
- 1588. DEFEAT OF THE SPANISH ARMADA.
- 1598. DEATH OF PHILIP OF SPAIN.

The Settlement of the Church. Elizabeth succeeded according to Henry's will. The position of the Church was finally settled. By a new Act of Supremacy the Sovereign was called "supreme governor of this realm ..as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal" and not the "supreme head" as Henry had been. By an Act of Uniformity the order of public worship was regulated. A Prayer Book somewhat modified from Cranmer's, Thirty-nine Articles of Faith and Religion, services entirely in English, the Communion Table placed in the body of the church, a certain very moderate use of vestments, and of course the maintenance of the Bishops, who were appointed by the Sovereign in reality though by the Cathedral clergy nominally; these were the distinguishing marks of the new settlement. Holders of extreme views, whether Puritans or Roman Catholics, objected. Yet the majority of the nation appear to have been satisfied. Indeed, had either set of extremists got the upper hand, there would have been civil war; but for over eighty years from Elizabeth's accession England was saved from that.

Roman Catholics were fined for non-attendance at church and were called "recusants." The mass was declared illegal and could therefore only be celebrated in private. The Pope never abandoned his claim to supremacy in England, and it was this claim that led to persecution of Roman Catholics, especially after 1570, when a papal "bull" declared Elizabeth excommunicated and plots were formed to assassinate her.

On the other hand many Protestants, who had fled to Switzerland to escape Mary's persecution, now brought back with them to England the ideas of Calvin. They called themselves Puritans, but it would be less confusing to use the word "Presbyterian," because "Puritan" may be applied to other later sects and indeed to any religious body of marked strictness or pureness of life. They wished to see an established and uniform Church, provided it was of a Calvinistic pattern, acknowledging the supremacy of no Sovereign, having no fixed Prayer Book, no symbols or vestments, and no Bishops. If they had had their way, congregations would have chosen their ministers and elders or Presbyters, and would have sent members to a General Assembly, which would have formed a kind of House of Commons for religious matters, a democratic form of government and naturally distasteful to Elizabeth. They would have persecuted those who disagreed with them, and claimed the right to interfere in private life and to punish for wrong-doing; such interference, which was practised both in Switzerland and in Scotland, is distasteful to the ordinary Englishman. Apparently a good many Puritanical clergy accepted the Act of Uniformity, hoping that further changes might be made towards the Presbyterian views; at least they were satisfied with the position of the Communion Table, and if they did not like the use of a surplice they put up with it. A sect of "separatists," who were known as the Brownists, disliked both Bishops and Presbyters. To rule the reformed Church Elizabeth established the Court of High Commission in 1583, a sort of Star Chamber for religious matters.

Later in Elizabeth's reign we begin to hear of the doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings. The king is ordained of God, and therefore the succession cannot be altered, he can do no wrong; resistance to him is wicked. "No Bishops, no King," was the Stuart ideal. This doctrine, and Archbishop Laud's attempt to make the services more ornate and more reverential, contributed largely to our civil war. But Elizabeth, while effectively asserting her supremacy in Church government, did not push her views so far as to give any cause for civil war.

Mary Stuart's claim to England. England was in great danger. Calais had been lost, there was practically no navy, and no means of arming the nation. Elizabeth had to rely upon her wits, and on the advice of her cautious statesman Sir William Cecil. The danger was from Scotland and France in alliance. If her sister Mary, daughter of Catharine of Aragon, had been the queen of England, then, Elizabeth as daughter of Anne Boleyn was illegitimate and had no claim to the throne except by Henry VIII's will. If that were set aside, the true heiress was Mary Stuart, granddaughter of James IV and Margaret Tudor Henry VIII's eldest sister. She was Queen of Scots, and her Roman Catholic mother Mary of Guise was acting as regent for her in Scotland. Her husband, the Dauphin in 1558, became King Francis II of France in 1559. Queen of Scotland and France, and Queen by right of birth of England, she was a dangerous rival. Therefore Elizabeth had to look to Philip of Spain as her ally, and there was even talk of her marrying him; a very curious state of affairs, for not only was Philip a strong Catholic, but it was quite out of the question for Elizabeth to marry her sister's widower. The daughter of Anne Boleyn could not but believe that this would be as wrong as for her father to marry his brother's widow. As regards marriage it may be at once said that she feared to share her power with anyone. If she were fond of any man at all, that man was Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, brother of Guilford Dudley, and she knew perfectly well that he had married Amy Robsart; in representing that this marriage was a secret and in much else Sir Walter Scott's Kenilworth is not historical, and indeed the whole of Kenilworth is a jumble of inaccuracies; but it is true that Amy died mysteriously.

Danger from Scotland averted. Elizabeth was saved from anxiety from Scotland by a religious war. The Scots had rather suddenly adopted the Presbyterian views. Their great leader and preacher John Knox, who had returned from Geneva, wrote a fierce pamphlet against the "Monstrous Regiment [or Government] of Women"; it was aimed at the rule of Mary of Guise. Many Scottish nobles were strong Protestants with an eye to the plunder of the Church. Elizabeth did not like helping rebels, especially Presbyterian rebels, but the chance was too good to be missed. She sent troops to assist the Scots to besiege the French garrison of Leith. Mary of Guise died; and in 1560 by the Treaty of Edinburgh both the French and the English were to evacuate Scotland. This was just what Elizabeth wanted, and the old alliance of France and Scotland, founded 260 years previously, was finally broken. Mary Stuart, returning a widow to Scotland, found her subjects, at least a vast majority of them, strong Protestants and strongly opposed to her. She had to put up with the preaching of Knox and the rough advice of the nobles headed by her half-brother James of Moray. She was no longer dangerous to Elizabeth.

Danger from France averted. From France also the danger disappeared. There was the Catholic party headed by the Duke of Guise, and the Protestants or Huguenots headed by Admiral Coligny. In the French wars of religion nobles of the highest rank were found on either side; Paris was Catholic, and many districts in the south and west were Huguenot. Francis II was succeeded by his brother Charles IX. The real ruler of the country however was the Queen-mother, Catharine of Medici, a clever and intriguing Italian Princess from Florence. Philip of Spain proposed to Catharine that France and Spain should combine to crush the Protestants in both countries. Catharine refused; she would play off Catholics against Huguenots, and thus strengthen the Crown of France by weakening the nobles of both sides. Thus Elizabeth no longer feared either France or Scotland.

The story of Mary Stuart. Mary Stuart married a second time in Scotland, choosing her cousin Henry Darnley, a man of very evil character. She was surrounded by spies and enemies, and it is impossible to say for certain whether she is more to be pitied or blamed. Certainly most people pity her. Darnley murdered before her eyes her Italian secretary, Rizzio. Next, Darnley was murdered. Next, Mary married, perhaps under compulsion, an upstart named Bothwell who was almost certainly guilty of Darnley's murder. The nobles rose headed by Moray, forced her to abdicate in favour of her baby son James, and imprisoned her in a castle on a little island in Loch Leven. She escaped and threw herself upon the loyalty of the Catholic families, especially the Hamiltons; was defeated at Langside near Glasgow, and fled across the Solway into England. This was in 1568. What could Elizabeth do? send Mary back to Scotland by force of arms, or by treaty? or to France? or keep her in England? Each course was dangerous. Finally she kept her in England for nearly nineteen years. It was dangerous to have her rival here, for not only was there an immediate rising of the north-country Catholics, which however was easily put down, but also there were continual plots to release Mary and kill Elizabeth. But on the whole it was the safest policy. Elizabeth might be threatened by plots, but she had as a hostage in her power the woman who claimed the throne of England. As long as she was a hostage, there was no fear that any foreign power would try to invade England. Mary had an unhappy time. Yet it is difficult to say that Elizabeth ought to have done anything different for the good of England. The Pope issued a bull dethroning Elizabeth; it only made Englishmen indignant and so strengthened her position.

Spain and the Revolt of the Netherlands. As the years passed by, Elizabeth saw that the enemy most to be feared was no longer France but Spain. Philip became the champion of Mary Stuart, and the Spanish ambassador organized plots to murder Elizabeth. On the other hand Philip was engaged in a desperate struggle against his subjects in the Netherlands. He determined to garrison that country with Spanish soldiers, and to introduce the Spanish Inquisition. The Netherlands had always claimed rights of self-government, as in the old days when they were under the Dukes of Burgundy. War broke out, partly religious, partly political. At the head of the rebels was William the Silent, Prince of Orange, a German by birth. Many Netherlands were driven to take to the sea, and as privateers pillaged the ships trading between Spain and Flanders; they sold their plunder and filled up with provisions and water at Dover. Pretending to fear Philip, but secretly encouraging them, Elizabeth ordered them away. They swooped down upon the coast of Holland, their own native land, captured a little town called Brill, then occupied Flushing, and lit a flame of revolt which never died out. This was in 1572.

The same year Queen Catharine of France, frightened at the growing power of the Huguenots and by the revolt in Holland which the Huguenots were supporting, brought about the notorious massacre on St Bartholomew's day, August 24. The Huguenots were prostrate for a time. Coligny was among the victims, and young Henry of Navarre recanted. Yet even so, though the Huguenots were powerless to help them, under their chief or "stadtholder,"

William of Orange, the Netherlands held out. The Seven United Provinces of the north, Holland and Zealand at their head,—we now know the seven provinces by the name of Holland and call the inhabitants Dutch,—were never conquered. The savage Spanish general, the Duke of Alva, captured Haarlem, and cruelly massacred and plundered. But his successor failed to take Leyden, for the Dutch cut the dykes and brought their ships seven miles inland to save it; a University was founded in honour of the relief.

As the years went by, the hardy Dutch sailors and fisher-folk, nicknamed the Water Beggars in scorn, but taking the name as a title of honour, became the foremost seamen and merchants of Europe. On the other hand the Netherlands of the south, who had been in the middle ages the richest of the Netherlands, the Flemings and Brabanters and Hainaulters, the citizens of the manufacturing centres such as Ghent and Bruges, Brussels and Mechlin and Cambrai, and the great port of Antwerp, were reconquered by Philip's nephew Alexander, Duke of Parma. The Dutch, winning sea-power and religious liberty, secured the trade which had belonged to Flanders and Brabant. Reconquered by Spain, the southern Netherlands remained Catholic; their country corresponds more or less to modern Belgium.

Elizabeth's sense of security. Thus in this second decade of her reign the queen felt herself fairly safe. Mary Stuart was both prisoner and hostage. The Catholic nobles of the north rose and celebrated mass for the last time in an English cathedral, but they were put down. There was talk of a conspiracy to marry Mary to the Duke of Norfolk, a Catholic and great-grandson of the victor of Flodden. The Spanish ambassador knew of it, but no aid came to the conspirators from Spain. The Duke was attainted and executed. This is called the Ridolfi Plot, 1572. But Elizabeth would not defy Philip openly; indeed she pretended to please him when in 1572 she made the Dutch quit Dover. Cecil would have liked open war, yet we must admit that the queen's policy was sound. As long as Mary Stuart was securely held and Philip busy with the Netherlanders, she could let the strength of England grow till she felt herself able to throw off the mask. This is the key to her puzzling hesitations and contradictory orders; she did not wish to strike till she knew that England could strike hard. Meanwhile in spite of the St Bartholomew massacre she discussed the question whether she should marry one of the sons of Catharine of Medici, France being no longer the enemy, but the ally to balance Spain.

Drake and the Sea-dogs of Devon. It was the men of Devon and the South-West who first showed the way to attack Spain. You will remember how under Edward I and Edward III the Cinque Ports fell off and the towns of the west coasts grew in importance, Fowey and Dartmouth contributing 47 and 31 ships to the Calais fleet in 1347. But now there was a yet more important expansion of the art of seamanship. We have reached the dawn of modern navigation. Under Henry VII and Henry VIII there had been explorations in imitation of the Spaniards and Portuguese, but they had been few and spasmodic. Now came the age of daring attempts to reach India by a north-west passage, to find a fabled Eldorado or land of gold, to create colonies. The experience of the Atlantic gales led to inventions in the design of ships and rigging beyond what was sufficient for the Channel or even the Bay of Biscay. Of course there was plenty of regular trade with Spain. But these men of Devon wanted to trade with the Spanish West Indies. Philip objected, and wanted to keep Spanish trade in Spanish hands. Hence troubles arose. It is very hard to pass judgment on John Hawkins and Francis Drake. Spain had a right to object, but then there was the Inquisition which tortured English prisoners and challenged reprisals. There is but a narrow line between private adventure such as Drake's and buccaneering, or between buccaneering and downright piracy. Drake would have called his buccaneering open war against Spain and the iniquitous Inquisition. Yet we may fairly doubt if the Spaniards would have been thought to be so supremely wicked and cruel, if there had not been profit in plundering them. The spirit of adventure is finely expressed in Westward Ho!, but there was certainly also a spirit of greed in the adventurers which Kingsley did not illustrate, his men are all heroic Protestants.

The voyage round the world. In 1567 Hawkins and Drake sailed from Plymouth, kidnapped negroes and sold them in the West Indies, then were treacherously set upon, and lost all their treasure and all their ships but one; the prisoners were tortured by the officers of the Inquisition. Drake vowed vengeance. In 1572 he sailed to the Isthmus of Panama where the silver of Peru was carried over from the Pacific. Here he caught his first glimpse of the Pacific from a lofty tree. His success was marvellous. But he had to leave his treasure behind when the Spaniards rallied from their surprise. His seamanship was magnificent, but there were no guard-ships then in the Spanish waters, and surprise contributed to his partial success as much as his daring. Next, in 1577 he started on his great voyage with five little ships, of which the Pelican alone was over 100 tons. In September 1578 he passed through the straits of Magellan in the Pelican, re-named the Golden Hind; it was a record passage of seventeen days, unbeaten till the 19th century. Up the coast of Chile and Peru he plundered, and reached as far north as the 42nd parallel, thence by way of the Philippines and the Cape of Good Hope he came home to Plymouth in 1580. The precise value of his booty can never be known.

Elizabeth drifts into war. The queen could not disown Drake or punish him to please Philip. Plots against her life grew more frequent; priests and Jesuits came over secretly to England, and assassination was in the air. At last the chief ministers and nobles of England banded themselves into an Association to protect her, and in case of her death to take vengeance on Mary Stuart. Again she meditated marriage with a French prince, Francis of Anjou, the youngest son of Catharine, a peculiarly vile man, but the sovereignty of the Netherlands had been offered to him. A combination of France and England with the rebel Dutch seemed to be very promising, but Anjou spoilt it by trying to loot Antwerp, he had to return humiliated to France, and Elizabeth threw him over promptly. Then William of Orange, whose life had been already attempted, was assassinated. Help, open help of royal troops under the Earl of Leicester, was at last sent to the now leaderless Netherlanders in 1585, yet not in time to save Antwerp from being taken by Alexander of Parma. The English fought a famous battle at Zutphen where the heroic Philip Sidney fell, yet Parma was steadily re-conquering the southern Netherlands, and something more had to be done by Elizabeth. Leicester was a bad soldier and the aid of England was not at first of much value to the Dutch. Now Philip retaliated upon her and her support of Drake by seizing English traders with their ships and cargoes in Spanish ports, for till now there had been regular trade between England and Spain. Elizabeth sent Drake to the West Indies with 25 ships under a commission as a queen's officer; it was just like her that she should have tried to stop him after he had started. Drake wrought great havoc, but gained little booty. His men suffered fearfully from yellow fever, and three quarters of them died. Moreover the Spaniards were now on their guard against surprise. Just at this time Walter Raleigh made his attempt to colonize Virginia, so named in honour of the unmarried queen. Drake on his return home brought away the starving survivors of the unlucky colony

Babington Plot: Execution of Mary. The last plot against Elizabeth's life takes its name from a young man named Babington. Her secretaries, Walsingham and Davison, knew all about it and aimed at implicating Mary herself. Letters, either genuine or forged, were produced to show that Mary knew of the plot. Parliament and the ministers insisted that she should be tried; Elizabeth gave way to the general feeling, and even signed the death warrant, and the Queen of Scots, prematurely aged by close on nineteen years of captivity and despair, was beheaded at Fotheringhay Castle in February 1587. Elizabeth turned on her secretary Davison for his share in urging her assent to the execution, and was wroth with Cecil and Walsingham; and unless we believe that she meant to respite Mary at the eleventh hour her conduct can only be described as dishonourable. The die was now cast. Philip had no reason to refrain from attacking England. As Mary's champion and avenger, and claiming our throne as Catholic heir through a daughter of John of Gaunt, he gave orders to prepare the Great Armada. Alexander of Parma with his army was to be ready to be brought over from Flanders. After the exciting incidents of the last few years it was at last open war.

How England was ready to meet Spain. Could English levies of raw militia face with success the trained cavalry and musketeers of Parma? Mere courage is useless in modern war without science and discipline. Certainly Englishmen were beginning to learn the art of war in the Netherlands, but was that enough? Luckily, as in Napoleon's time, the question had not to be solved, for the war was confined to the sea. Thirty years earlier England would have had no defence, but now there was the experience of Hawkins and Drake on which to rely. Hawkins had entered into the queen's service as her chief naval architect. He had built many new royal ships of improved build, and with inventions in the rigging, such as the sea experience of himself and Drake suggested, by means of which they could beat against the wind. Gunnery also was important, and a broadside fire was planned; however inaccurate the guns were, at least the trained sailors could hit a big Spanish hull at short range. But far above technical skill, great as it was, rose the genius of Drake, who first saw the way to save England by striking the enemy on his side of the sea. We are so accustomed to praise Nelson that we forget that this secret of sea warfare sprang from Drake's brain over two centuries before Nelson's victories. Moreover Drake had the technical skill to carry out his plan. With no naval base from which to fill up with water and victuals he hung about the Spanish coasts for some months, prevented the units of the Armada from joining each other, and sailing into Cadiz harbour did such damage that the Armada could not sail in 1587. This he called "singeing the King of Spain's beard." On the other hand the Spaniards, excellent as soldiers and explorers, had not studied naval warfare. Their best ships and seamen were Portuguese, Philip having recently become King of Portugal. As late as 1571, at Lepanto off the coast of Greece, had been fought the last galley action against the Turks by Spain and Venice combined. Of course galleys would be useless in choppy seas outside the Mediterranean, and the oars prevented broadside fire. The galleons, which were designed to take the place of oared galleys, were clumsy and top-heavy; they heeled over to the wind, and could not tack.

The Armada in action, July 21-29, 1588. Elizabeth in 1588 chose as commander Charles, Lord Howard of Effingham, grandson of the Duke of Norfolk of Flodden fame, and her own cousin, for Anne Boleyn was the Duke's granddaughter. He was a good sailor and by his high rank could secure obedience. He got on well with Drake, who indeed was of too domineering a temper for the chief command, but was an ideal second. Partly at Plymouth, partly off Flanders to keep an eye on Parma, were 49 ships of between 200 and 1000 tons, not so very inferior to the Spaniards in size, but infinitely more handy. The largest and best were queen's ships. Private adventure supplied many small craft insufficiently gunned for pitched battle. Howard and Drake wanted to go to Spain again and prevent the Armada from sailing. Elizabeth most unwisely ordered them to remain on the defensive; this is thoroughly bad policy, for the enemy can then choose his own time for coming. One shudders to think what might have happened if the Spaniards, arriving six weeks later, had found the English scattered for lack of victuals. But after many delays the Armada was sighted on July 20, not so strong in numbers as Philip had hoped; 120 ships and transports, 60 of them being over 300 tons; 24,000 men on board, but too many landmen in proportion to the sailors.

From Sunday, July 21, to Saturday, July 27, there was a running fight up channel before a south-west wind, the English just holding off and firing at pistol range at the big hulls, the Spaniards unable to close and board, heeling over and firing too high. They reached Calais and anchored off shore. On Sunday night Howard sent in fire-ships; the Spaniards cut their cables in panic, for they had had experience of fire-ships three years before at Antwerp. On Monday, July 29, came the pitched battle off Gravelines on the coast of Flanders. The brunt of the fighting fell mostly on the queen's ships which carried the heaviest guns. Huddled together by the English broadside fire, and drifting blindly on a lee shore, the Spaniards were well beaten and seemed to be doomed. The wind suddenly shifted and blew them out to sea to the north. There is a superstition that the gale saved England. But naval writers tell us that what landmen consider a gale is really only a high wind. Drake was in truth disappointed, he hoped to secure many prizes just as the change of wind balked him by driving the Spaniards away. Certainly his powder was running out, but the battle had been already won. Round Scotland and Ireland staggered the shot-riddled ships. Three had been lost in the channel, seven or eight off Gravelines, an unknown number were wrecked on the Irish coast, and less than half returned to Spain.

The Spanish Armada off Calais. From the House of Lords.

The sad part of the story has now to be related; the land forces had been mustered at Tilbury on the Essex bank of the Thames, and through inexperience they were attacked by enteric or other diseases that come from overcrowding.

Plymouth, Drake's Island, etc. from Mt Edgcumbe

Science of the sea gave victory to the fleet, ignorance of the science of health ruined the army. Elizabeth and her ministers have been much blamed, yet such a story of gallant men destroyed by disease is only too common in all ages. Elaborate precautions would have been impossible owing to expense as well as ignorance. In the same way it was not her stinginess but the difficulty of collecting enough victuals and powder that caused the ships to be ill supplied.

Many Roman Catholics had armed on Elizabeth's behalf against Spain; and it is even thought that Howard belonged to their communion, but there is evidence that he took the sacrament according to the rites of the English Church. The English Catholics were loyal as a body, and it was hoped that the laws against them might be modified. However, they were still oppressed. Recusants who stayed away from church were fined; priests who celebrated mass were hunted down. Of course all men of the puritanical way of thinking considered this to be right and natural. Others could argue that Catholics persecuted abroad, and therefore should be persecuted here; that as the Pope claimed absolute obedience from all English Catholics even against their own queen, and encouraged the assassination plots of foreign-trained priests, therefore they should all be punished, even those who wished to be loyal.

War of Retaliation on Spain. How was England to carry the war into the enemy's quarters? This is the question which confronts us in every war. The fleet alone can ward off invasion; a trained army is absolutely necessary for retaliation. If England has no large army, the only alternative is to have allies. Elizabeth thought to find such an ally in Portugal. There was a pretender to the Portuguese throne which was now occupied by Philip. So an expedition was sent out under Drake to capture Lisbon and rouse the Portuguese to revolt. It was typical of many such attempts. The army, 9000 strong under Sir John Norreys, was totally unfit for the work; many of the officers had seen war in the Netherlands, but the men were an untrained rabble. Much booty was secured and much damage done, but the Portuguese did not rise and Lisbon was not taken. So all hope of obtaining a naval base close to the enemy was lost. The policy of mere raiding can never bring an enemy to his knees. In 1591 there was the expedition to the Azores in which Richard Grenville fought his memorable battle in the *Revenge*¹. In 1595 Drake and Hawkins went on their last voyage to the West Indies; they lost many men, and themselves died. The Spaniards had by this time organized the Indian Guard and were not taken by surprise. Other expeditions went out under Howard and Essex, and Essex and Raleigh, it was the same story, much destruction wrought, but no permanent success achieved.

The Dutch and Henry of Navarre. Meanwhile hundreds of Englishmen were really learning the art of war in the Netherlands. It may even be said that the English allies saved Holland from total re-conquest by Parma during the years when young Maurice of Orange was growing to manhood to take his father's place. The most noteworthy of the English captains was Sir Horace Vere, and he and his brother captains were of a type very different from that of Leicester and the showy courtiers.

Now also came the final religious war in France. The leader of the Huguenots, the celebrated Henry of Navarre, was Duke of Bourbon on his father's side and a distant cousin of the royal family; his mother had been Queen of Navarre in her own right; he had married the daughter of Catharine of Medici. In 1590 he won the battle of Ivry. Then Parma crossed the border from Flanders and stopped his career of victory. Finally he reconciled himself with Rome, was accepted at last by the city of Paris, and became Henri IV in 1594. He granted complete liberty of worship to the Huguenots by the Edict of Nantes. His policy was always to maintain the balance of power against Spain and Austria, to be the ally of the Protestant Dutch, and to restrain the excessive power of the great feudal nobles of France. Thus he bequeathed as a legacy to his son and grandson, and it was not till many years had passed that the policy of the grandson, Louis XIV, turned France into an aggressive and persecuting power.

¹ She was not a very small ship she carried a crew of 250, and may have been as much as 500 tons, but tonnage was not accurately reckoned in those days.

English Rule in Ireland. Henry VIII was the first of our kings to call himself King of Ireland. The power of the English extended a very little way inland from Dublin, and the Tudors had to fight for the mastery in Ireland as if it were a strange unconquered country. Elizabeth planted colonies in Kildare, but beyond she had much fighting forced upon her by the strong feelings of the Irish for the Church of Rome, supported largely by the Spaniards. The warfare was very bitter, and it ruined the reputation of Elizabeth's last favourite, Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex. He was a vain young man, who, when disgraced by Elizabeth, tried to stir up a riot in London and was executed for treason.

Elizabeth's later Parliaments. The closing years of the reign were marked by a strong revival of the power of the Commons. In earlier days Elizabeth had domineered over her Parliaments as much as Henry VIII; probably she had been wise to do so, for she kept in check the unruly and loud-voiced members who were for extreme measures in church matters. Edward VI and Mary had called upon many out-of-the-way little towns to send members to the Commons, thereby securing the election of men who would be afraid to oppose the crown; such small towns, or even villages, were afterwards known as rotten boroughs, and maintained their right to elect members till the great Reform Bill of 1832. Elizabeth went still further, and created thirty such boroughs, mostly in Cornwall and Hants, though it is curious that some of the strongest opponents of the crown sat for such places. But she owed her throne to her popularity, and had to be careful not to offend people. The chief laws of her reign were measures against the Roman Catholics and their worship, prompted by the plots against her. In 1601 there was enacted a Poor Law by which each parish was made responsible for its own poor and compelled to provide relief.

The question of Monopolies. Elizabeth feared to risk her popularity by heavy taxation. But an indirect method of rewarding her favourites was the institution of monopolies; a courtier, a Leicester or a Raleigh perhaps, would be granted the sole right to export or to import some particular article. Of course these articles were very dear, but such a man as Raleigh made use of the money to do good in trying to colonize Virginia. The Commons protested against monopolies in 1601; Elizabeth yielded and withdrew them, doing this with such graceful words in a message sent through the Speaker, that she added to her popularity enormously. To give way gracefully is so valuable, and yet so rare a gift, that this episode marks clearly the difference between Elizabeth, now near to her death, and the coming Stuarts, who never gave way until they were forced. Granted that she was fond of favourites, mostly incompetent, that she loved flattery and show and pleasure, often showed bad temper and meanness to those who served her, that, while she was extravagant at court, she starved her soldiers and sailors, it remains that she just suited the nation at a critical period of its history and left behind her the name of Good Queen Bess. She must have been unhappy enough in her old age. Her old and faithful statesman, William Cecil, whom she had created Lord Burleigh, died five years before her, and many others of her trusted friends had passed away before her death in 1603.

Education, Building,* and Literature. Private benevolence did a great deal for education in this reign. If we look back to Edward VI, we remember that the Lords of his Council confiscated the lands of the chantries on the excuse that they wished to benefit education, yet they founded only a few schools. In 1553 Sir Andrew Judd, formerly Lord Mayor, founded a Grammar School at Tonbridge, and gave for it some land outside London near where is now St Pancras station. In Mary's reign one school was founded, Repton, by Sir John Port. Queen Elizabeth herself re-founded St Peter's College at Westminster. Under her Sir William Harper, who had also been Lord Mayor, bought a piece of land near Judd's to endow a Grammar School at Bedford, and Lawrence Sheriff the land next to it to endow Rugby. Little did they think how valuable the land would be when London was rebuilt after the Great Fire of 1666, and how their schools would profit. Similarly John Lyon, yeoman, of Preston, founded Harrow. In James I's reign Thomas Sutton bought what had been a Carthusian monastery in Smithfield not far from the "New Gate" of London, and there founded "the Charterhouse," partly as a school, partly as a home for poor gentlemen, which are celebrated in Thackeray's novel The Newcomes, and Edward Alleyn founded Dulwich.

All over England are to be seen great mansions built in Tudor reigns. The last castle was erected towards the end of the 14th century. The desire for luxury and comfort led the nobles in the 15th century to prefer to live in houses; one of the earliest is the red-brick mansion of Hurstmonceux in Sussex. In the 16th we have Wolsey's Hampton Court, Lord Burleigh's Stamford House, Hatfield House, and scores of others. A good deal of extravagance and show marks the century, and these houses and their gardens were planned on a great scale. Scott gives us a picture of the Earl of Leicester's display at Kenilworth. Castles were deserted, not because of the invention of gunpowder, but because they were gloomy and comfortless; the need for them came again in the Civil War.

The blaze of literary glory which marks Elizabeth's reign was wonderful. The excitements of the century, the keenness of religious arguments, the new ideas stirring in men's minds as a consequence of the revival of classical learning and of the astounding discoveries in a new world, must have had their influence in producing poets such as Edmund Spenser and Philip Sidney. Living over into the next reign, yet belonging to what we call Elizabethan literature, were Francis Bacon the essayist, Walter Raleigh who was historian as well as sailor, and above all, Shakespeare. But even before Shakespeare there were other dramatists, whose names are barely known to many people of the present day simply because they were eclipsed by him. Shakespeare's patriotism, his keen love of England and England's exploits, are clearly seen in plays written before Elizabeth died. Both in King John and in Henry V we see this. John is represented as something of a patriot, and after his death when England is rallying herself against the Frenchmen the play ends with these lines:

"Now these her princes are come home again,
Come the three corners of the world in arms,
And we shall shock them Naught shall make us rue,
If England to itself do rest but true."

THE FAMILY OF HOWARD.

THE HOUSE OF STUART, 1603—1714

JAMES I, 1603—1625

THIRTY YEARS' WAR IN GERMANY, 1618.

James Episcopalian or Presbyterian? James I of England and VI of Scotland succeeded to the throne. It was a union of crowns only, not of Parliaments. The French alliance having been broken by John Knox and the Protestants, there was no political trouble to hinder his accession. Scotland suffered by the removal of the court to London; as time went on it was seen that the Stuarts looked upon the throne of England as more valuable than that of Scotland. Nor was this strange. James had been brought up by Presbyterian preachers who thought themselves superior even to the king, and he probably retained a lively memory of their long sermons. He came to England and found himself Head of the Church. Here kings chose their archbishops and bishops, and here flourished the doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings, which taught that his crown came to him from Heaven, and that it would be a crime to depose him, as his mother Mary had been deposed by Moray and Knox. That he became an ardent Church-of-England king was to be expected. The Scottish Presbyterians were 'disappointed; the English Puritans who wished to have a church on the model of that in Scotland were disappointed likewise, and constantly looked to Scotland for help. One of the first events of the reign was a conference of Bishops and Puritans, held at Hampton Court, to debate about their differences; naturally nothing came of it, for neither side would give way. Indirectly, however, it had one enormously important result, namely the translation of the Bible which we still use and know as the Authorized Version. On the other side the Roman Catholics expected James, when free from Scottish Puritanism, to declare himself for them, for Mary Stuart, his mother, had been looked on as a martyr for their cause.

He was not at all an amiable man nor a pleasant figure at the head of church and state. He babbled about being Pater Patriae, Father of his Country, yet was undignified, slovenly, and nasty in his personal habits. No flattery could be too gross for him; he swallowed it greedily and expected it. He chose shockingly bad favourites, and there were unpleasant stories about their behaviour at court.

Policy towards Spain and the Roman Catholics. The first two questions that came up were concerned with the Spanish war and the treatment of Roman Catholics. James was shrewd and sensible enough in foreign affairs. He wanted to make peace with Spain, as indeed Elizabeth had done in her closing years. England was far too poor to be able to set up a standing army or to maintain an adequate navy, and mere raids could never bring a war to a really satisfactory end. As the generation of Drake passed away, adventurous raiding tended to become buccaneering, and was not far removed from piracy. James' minister was Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, son of Elizabeth's Lord Burleigh. Cecil favoured peace. The opponent of the peace policy was Sir Walter Raleigh, the last of the Elizabethan school of adventurers. There were various plots in the air; Raleigh was accused by Salisbury of being implicated, and was thrown into the Tower, but his real crime was his opposition to peace with Spain.

James seems to have tried honestly to give some measure of relief to Roman Catholics. Fines for non-attendance at church were remitted, and negotiations were entered into with Rome. But the Pope would not surrender his claim to the absolute obedience of the Roman Catholics of England. The negotiations were therefore sure to fail. In 1604 and 1605 some ardent Roman Catholics plotted to destroy both king and parliament. The story is well known. A room was hired and a tunnel was being mined towards the House of Lords; then the plan was changed, and a cellar directly underneath was hired; here powder was stored under faggots of wood. Lord Monteagle was mysteriously warned not to attend Parliament on November 5. A search was made, the powder was found, and the agent of the conspirators, Guy Fawkes, an old soldier of fortune, was arrested, tortured, and made to confess. Catesby and Percy and other conspirators were killed as they resisted the officials sent to arrest them. For the act of these few the whole body of Roman Catholics was punished; the fines were again imposed, and priests who celebrated mass secretly were once more hunted down.

Later on Raleigh was released from the Tower that he might sail in search of some fabled goldmine up the Orinoco in South America, but he was forbidden to fight the Spaniards. The expedition failed, and there was some fighting. He was, on his return, beheaded for alleged piracy, but really to please the Spanish ambassador. We can understand James' peace policy, yet must ever lament the fate of such a man at the bidding of Spain. Peace could have been maintained without this sacrifice. Nor do we admire the way in which James allowed the navy to fall into decay; poor as England was, some effort could have been made to keep it up. Also his design of marrying one of his sons to a Spanish princess was very unpopular at the time, and has been condemned since by all historians.

The Dutch and the Elector Palatine. Towards the Protestant powers James was inclined to give himself airs as though he were their patron. He gave his advice to the Dutch upon all matters, whether military or religious. He was probably wise in making with them a military treaty, which allowed them to enlist volunteers in England and Scotland, not as king of England's men, but as a permanent mercenary force in their pay, also certain towns upon their coast which Queen Elizabeth had held as security were restored to the Dutch for a sum of money down. Henceforward under Maurice and Frederick of Orange, sons of the murdered William the Silent, the Dutch army was one of the finest in Europe, and the English and Scottish brigades in it were always up to strength and always doing good work.* Thus plenty of our men were learning how to fight, though we had no army at home. The Dutch also kept up a formidable navy against Spain at a time when ours was worthless.

James married his daughter Elizabeth to a Protestant German prince, Frederick the Elector Palatine, whose territory lay on the middle Rhine and corresponded partly to the modern Baden. In 1618 a fearful war of religion broke out in Germany, when the Elector Palatine was put forward by the Protestants to be king of Bohemia. He was not only driven out of Bohemia, but also lost his own country of the Palatinate; with the unhappy Elizabeth he was a homeless exile. Yet James could do nothing to help his daughter and son-in-law; he had neither the means nor the men. The war thus begun lasted until 1648 and is called the Thirty Years' War. It certainly seemed as if the German Catholics, headed by Austria and supported by Spain, were going to sweep all Protestant princes from their thrones. The Dutch alone held their own. Meanwhile it must have been galling to Englishmen that they could do nothing to support the cause except as volunteers. It was because of this war that Englishmen bitterly resented the idea of a Spanish marriage for the Prince of Wales.

Beginnings of East Indian Trade. For the past hundred years the Portuguese had kept in their own hands the trade round the Cape to the East, and Venice had been steadily declining. English and Flemish and Dutch traders went to Lisbon for spices and silks, and thence brought them to market at London, Antwerp, and Amsterdam. But when Philip II annexed Portugal this was forbidden, and the Protestant powers thought of trading themselves directly with the East Indies. Thus Portugal suffered because England and Holland were at war with Spain. Before Elizabeth died several companies of merchants had been formed for direct trade with Turkey and the Levant, but the most important was the East India Company. There was a great demand for spice and fine raiment, and the profits were very great. The Great Mogul, the Mohammedan Emperor at Delhi, granted permission in 1613 for a "factory," a settlement of warehouses and residences, to be established at Surat on the Tapti river in western India. James sent Sir Thomas Roe as his ambassador to Delhi, and thus gained privileges for the Company, but made them pay him for them. The Portuguese of Goa were bitterly hostile. Captain Best with some armed merchantmen had to win a fight at sea in 1612 before peaceful trade was possible.

Further afield the English merchants joined with the Dutch in trading in the Spice Islands, Java and Sumatra, and especially Amboyna, an island a thousand miles east of Java, the most suitable spot for growing cloves. The Portuguese were quite unable to prevent the trade, but the English and Dutch soon quarrelled; the Dutch destroyed our settlement and murdered our men in Amboyna in 1623. We were compelled to limit our trade to the mainland of India, and sooner or later the bitter commercial jealousy between the traders was certain to extend to the mother-countries. Holland had then by far the stronger navy, and England had no chance of getting revenge or compensation for the massacre. Thus the two Protestant powers, old allies against Spain for religion, would in the future fight against each other for trade and pocket; this happened in the days of the Commonwealth. Meanwhile the mother countries were at peace though the traders fought.

Plantation of Colonies in America. On the other side of the world Englishmen went to colonize rather than to trade. In 1607 the Virginia Company, under the leadership of Captain John Smith, after much toil and suffering founded Virginia under a charter from James. It sounds absurd that a king should give to a company land upon a distant and savage coast which does not belong to him, but the granting of a charter means that the colonists take with them the law of England and live under the flag. The capital of the settlement was called Jamestown, and the river on which it was situated the James river. There was no blind search for gold, and very soon it was found that the cultivation of the new plant called tobacco, which Raleigh had been the first to discover, held great commercial possibilities. The story of the foundation of Virginia is indeed pathetic, for Raleigh himself at that moment was lying in the Tower. Settlements were made also in the Bermudas and the island of Barbados; "the still vexed Bermoothes" have the honour of being mentioned in Shakespeare's last play, The Tempest. Gradually other small islands of the outer ring of the West Indies were occupied by buccaneers, Dutch and French as well as English; they were useful posts from which to harry the Spaniards, who had occupied the bigger or inner islands, the mainland of Mexico, the Isthmus, and Venezuela, but had forgotten the need of holding the outer ring as a gateway. Downright piracy flourished in the West Indies in consequence.

Meanwhile a band of Puritans, who found themselves unable to worship at home as they wished, settled by leave of the Virginia Company on the land just to the north of Cape Cod, and there founded New Plymouth. These were the Pilgrim Fathers who sailed from the English Plymouth in the Mayflower, and were the pioneers of the Puritan colonies of New England. Soon the charter of the Virginia Company was withdrawn, and the colony of Virginia was taken over by the crown and a royal governor nominated.

Plantation of Protestants in Ulster. In Ireland the Roman Catholics of Ulster under the O'Neills, who had always held out against Queen Elizabeth, were in an almost perpetual state of war. The Earl of Tyrone, Hugh O'Neill, fled to Rome, his lands were declared forfeit, and James sent over to Ulster colonies of Englishmen and Scots. The city of London equipped those who settled at Derry, hence the name Londonderry. Most of the colonists were not only Protestants but also strong Puritans, and down to our days there has been intense religious bitterness in north Ireland between the natives and the settlers. Also the system of land tenure was altered; the Irish regarded land as belonging to the clan and not to individuals, the newcomers farmed each his bit of land as his own private property. Here then were planted the seeds of enmity which ripened into war in the days of Charles I, of Cromwell and of William III. But the English and Scots were infinitely better farmers than the native Irish.

Rights and privileges of Parliament. Under James I the House of Commons gained new strength and left as a legacy to the next reign a growing spirit of resistance to the king's will. James held out for the Royal Prerogative, the right of the king to be above the law, just as much as any of the Tudors. Against him the Commons stood up for Privilege of Parliament. On one occasion the king asserted that Parliament had no privileges except by his will. The Commons did indeed win from him their right to settle disputed elections; also their own personal freedom from arrest while Parliament was sitting, except for treason and felony. They voted tonnage and poundage, that is so much money on every tun of wine and every pound of dry goods imported from abroad. James followed a precedent of Mary and Elizabeth in claiming the right to increase the sum voted; these extra customs duties were known as impositions. The Commons protested, but James won his point. Also he renewed the monopolies which Elizabeth had given up. For all his shrewdness he was not clever enough to see that the old tyranny of the Tudor monarchs was not possible now, especially as the family of Stuart was personally unpopular, and the court favourites more unpopular still. Public opinion was growing; James, not seeing this, left his son to meet the full force of its hostility.

Right to impeach the King's Ministers. Just at the end of the reign the House made a great effort which foretold the opposition which Charles would experience. It revived the old practice of impeachment in attacking Mompesson and others as holders of monopolies, and by a somewhat similar procedure brought about the downfall of the Lord Chancellor, Francis Bacon, Viscount St Albans. Impeachment was the old method of attacking the king's ministers which had been adopted by the Good Parliament of Edward III. The Commons accused the minister before the House of Lords. The accusation was that, when as Lord Chancellor he was acting as a judge, he had taken presents of money from suitors. He was condemned, fined, and dismissed. So in the next reign the Commons had these examples to look back upon when they impeached in turn Buckingham and Strafford.

The influence of one of James' courtiers towards the end of the reign was infinitely bad. George Villiers was a country gentleman raised by sheer favouritism to be Duke of Buckingham, and his head was turned by power. He went with Prince Charles to Spain to pay court to the Infanta, James being bent on the "Spanish Match" for his son and heir. The Spaniards were offended by Buckingham's conduct and the match³ was broken off. In revenge James and Buckingham prepared to interfere in the Thirty Years' War on the Protestant side. But the only force which they sent out, untrained and ill equipped, perished of starvation and disease. At this point James died, leaving to Charles a bad favourite and a difficult war.

CHARLES I, 1625—1649,

FOUR YEARS OF PARLIAMENT, 1625—1629.

ELEVEN YEARS OF NO PARLIAMENT, 1629—1640.

THE LONG PARLIAMENT, 1640.

THE EXECUTION OF STRAFFORD, 1641.

Charles had the advantage over his father that he had the manners of a gentleman. His court was not disgraced by drunkenness. He had a winning behaviour, and many of his adherents were devoted to him. Was he conscientious, or was he only obstinate? Such a question every one answers for himself. He was strongly attached to the doctrine of Divine Right, to the maintenance of the Church, and the Royal Prerogative. But he could not understand that the feeling of the country was more puritanical than it had been under James. He began badly, at least in the eyes of Puritans, by marrying the Roman Catholic daughter of Henri IV, Henriette Marie.

Buckingham and a Policy of War. James I had been blamed for making peace with Spain, and doing nothing to help the Elector Frederick and other Protestants of Germany. Charles, with Buckingham as his adviser, began his reign by planning a great Protestant alliance to help Frederick, and persuaded his uncle, Christian IV of Denmark, to join, together with France. Louis XIII, whose minister was the famous Cardinal Richelieu, was a Catholic, but the Edict of Nantes was in force in France, and Louis and Richelieu were ready to help Protestants against Austria and Spain. The English Puritans might have been expected to sympathize; but they could see nothing beyond the fact that France was Catholic, and that Queen Henriette was a Catholic and wanted freedom of worship. Above all they hated the supremacy of Buckingham. He was a gaudy man, not only gaudy in dress, but showy and incapable. It was a point of honour with the House of Commons to oppose him, to pull tight the purse-strings even if thereby no aid could be sent to the German Protestants and Christian. The cry of Charles' first Parliament was "Tonnage and Poundage for one year only, not for the king's life; no subsidies as long as Buckingham is favourite." An expedition was sent against Cadiz in imitation of Drake's raids. It was an utter failure, for the men were impressed and quite untrained. Some English ships lent to the French were used against the revolted Huguenots of La Rochelle.

Expedition to Relieve La Rochelle. The second Parliament in 1626 attributed every error to Buckingham and impeached him. To save him Charles dissolved Parliament. Then Buckingham changed round and made war on France; it was as if he were bent on war, no matter against whom, as long as he could get military glory for himself and pose as the champion of distressed Protestants. Scandal said that he was in love with the Queen of France and jealous of the great French minister, Cardinal Richelieu. The French government made a strong effort to reduce La Rochelle, blockaded it and constructed a mole across the harbour-mouth. Buckingham in person led a relief-expedition in 1627; he failed, for, though brave enough, he was quite ignorant of war, and the men were as badly trained as ever. The money for the expedition had been raised by a forced loan.

Meanwhile Christian of Denmark, poorly supported from England because Parliament had grudged the money, was badly beaten. The Catholics in Germany carried every thing before them.

A Landmark in English History. The third Parliament met in 1628. The Commons, led by Sir John Eliot and Sir Thomas Wentworth, were perfectly determined to stand upon their rights against forced loans. No matter how often the Yorkist and Tudor kings had violated Magna Carta, they would now make a definite stand, and in the debates again and again was reference made to Magna Carta and Edward I's Confirmation. No matter if La Rochelle fell for lack of English help, the first duty of Englishmen was to oppose forced loans. So the Petition of Right was presented, being a conscious effort to insist on the two chief clauses of the Charter. It will be seen that each clause of the Petition grew out of the French war:—

1. No loan or tax shall be collected except by vote of Parliament (because the La Rochelle forced loan was not by vote).

2. No freeman shall be imprisoned without due cause (because men had been imprisoned for not paying the La Rochelle loan).

3. Soldiers and sailors shall not be billeted on private houses (because this was the method of punishing men who had refused the La Rochelle loan).

4. There shall be no more commissioners appointed authorized to punish offenders by Martial Law.

The last two clauses make the raising of an army practically impossible, because there were then no barracks, and obedience cannot be enforced on soldiers except by martial law. But the Commons wanted to prevent the king from punishing his opponents who refused to pay.

The lords for a time favoured the insertion of a phrase "Saving the King's Prerogative." Charles kept to the old idea that a king had a right to be above the law in special cases for the national good, and surely, he might argue, a war-loan to help Protestants was good. But the Commons were the more obstinate. Charles gave way at last unconditionally and accepted the Petition. Then the Commons voted him £350,000; if their rights were acknowledged, they would be ready to support a Protestant war.

Very soon afterwards Buckingham was murdered in the streets of Portsmouth as he was superintending a new relief-expedition. This did indeed sail, and was as unsuccessful as the first one. Then the "proud city of the waters" surrendered through starvation after a blockade of many months. The policy of Richelieu is quite clear; the Huguenot stronghold must be ruined, not because it was Huguenot, but because it was a centre of rebellion and a gateway for any enemy to enter France.

Sir John Eliot's Resolutions. Charles had accepted the Petition and collected his £350,000. He had agreed to give up forced loans. But "tonnage and poundage" was not a "tax," and therefore was not covered by the Petition; so he continued to collect it at the ports as his royal right. Eliot was far from satisfied. In 1629 the same Parliament held a second session, and he prepared three resolutions to put before the Commons. Finch, the Speaker, refused to let them be put; so two members held him down in his chair, while the door was locked. "Whoever shall bring in innovation or introduce popery shall be reputed a capital enemy to this Kingdom; Whoever shall advise the levying of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by Parliament; Whoever shall voluntarily yield or pay the same, shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England." There was a scuffle round the Speaker's chair. Shouts were raised of "Aye, Aye." The door was unlocked; in came the king's official to declare Parliament dissolved; and for eleven years to come there was no Parliament. Eliot was tried for riot and sent to the Tower, where he died three years later of lung-disease brought on by the cold of his cell, he was only forty. Of all Charles' opponents he was the most honest and single-minded. One of the members who had held down the Speaker remained in prison for the full eleven years, the other was lucky enough to escape.

Wentworth goes over to the King. If Eliot was a martyr in the cause of Parliament, we are not at all forced to condemn Wentworth. They represent different types of mind. It is quite true that Wentworth had been one of the first to present the Petition, and then turned round and served Charles through the eleven years of no Parliament. But he had opposed Buckingham and his gaudy policy of making war on France without sufficient means or capacity to secure success; he had objected to the La Rochelle loan for this reason. He did not oppose the king as the king; he favoured some compromise with regard to the "saving" clause at the end of the Petition, so as not to weaken too much the royal authority. In his eyes Parliament was too fond of haggling over money, and was less likely than the Crown to direct foreign policy well. Therefore when once Buckingham was dead, he was quite willing to serve Charles. Macaulay misunderstands the position when he calls Wentworth an "apostate" and "the first of the rats." We mean by a "rat" not merely a man who changes sides, but one who after changing persecutes his former friends and betrays their secrets. Wentworth was always for efficiency under a strong king, and had considered Buckingham to be a source of weakness. He saw how France was gaining strength under the strong rule of Richelieu, and he wished to be the English Richelieu. His first idea was to make peace with both Spain and France, to abstain from war, even from helping the Protestants, and to build up an army and a navy with which some future war might be successfully carried on.

A Necessary or Iniquitous Tax? Charles did not at first consult Wentworth to any great extent, but came later to rely more largely on his advice. The most celebrated device of the "Eleven Years" of no Parliament, the famous Ship Money, was suggested, not by Wentworth, but by a lawyer named Noy; indeed, similar demands for money to equip ships were made in Buckingham's time. We go back to the days of Edward III, who had a right to call for ships from the ports, and for troops to defend the coast, not only from the counties on the coast, but also from the midlands. If a king has the right to ships, he has (argued the king's advisers) the right to money wherewith to build ships. Charles actually built new ships with the money and repaired old ones. Had he an enemy in view? Certainly; the Mohammedan corsairs of the Mediterranean were no longer restrained by Venice, who had fallen from her high position as the naval defence of Christendom;

"The Sovereign of the Seas," built for Charles I from the proceeds of ship money, 1637

they often raided even in the Channel. The Ship Money fleet sailed, captured a stronghold of the infidels on the coast of North Africa, and rescued many Christian galley-slaves. In fact the iniquitous tax was the first step towards our gaining sea power in the Mediterranean. Moreover the Dutch were very strong at sea, and no compensation for the massacre of Amboyna was forthcoming. It is unfair to praise what Henry VIII did for the Navy and to blame Charles for restoring the navy; more unfair to abuse Charles and Wentworth and to praise Cromwell, for Cromwell carried to a climax the very policy that Charles and Wentworth suffered for beginning, namely the maintenance of a strong army and navy by heavy taxation without vote of Parliament.

Complaints were raised against the first levy of ship money, but nobody resisted payment; when however it was imposed year after year, a Buckinghamshire squire, John Hampden, refused to pay. His was made a test case. The judges had been appointed by, and could be dismissed by, Charles himself; seven out of twelve decided against Hampden, and he paid rather than suffer the fate of Eliot.

The Church Innovations of Laud. The adviser of Charles in Church matters was William Laud, Bishop of London, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. One of Eliot's resolutions had been against innovation and popery, and Laud was the innovator. His views we should now call High Church and ritualistic. He wished the services to be less puritanical, and, his enemies said, more papistical. He favoured the use of vestments, of decoration and symbols. In particular he ordered the communion-table to be removed from the body of the church, and to be set up again at the east-end as an altar. His defence was that he stood for reverence in the church-service by insisting on forms and ceremonies. The method by which he tried to silence opponents was that he summoned them before the Court of High Commission or the Star Chamber. We do not approve of the severe sentences, the pillory and the cropping off of ears. But in fairness it must be admitted that the writers who were thus punished used most coarse and extravagant language. Not many men were condemned and mutilated, but their cases attracted much attention.

The Eleven Years outside England. While England has no Parliament let us look abroad. The Thirty Years' War still raged. Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, intervened on the Protestant side. The hardy and disciplined Swedes beat back the Catholic armies out of North Germany, but after two years of glory and victory Gustavus was killed in battle at Lutzen in 1632. He left the Swedish army the model of what a national army should be. His daughter Christina and her French allies continued the war. La Rochelle once crushed and French Protestants once powerless, Cardinal Richelieu entered energetically into an alliance to help German Protestants against Austria and Spain. Very many Scots served under the Swedish flag; but Englishmen who wanted to see fighting still preferred the Dutch service, and the long war between Holland and Spain still dragged on.

In India our merchants had hitherto traded and had their "factories" in native towns such as Surat. In 1639 the Company was able at last to buy a piece of land on the east coast, six miles by one, on a surf-beaten beach where no harbour could be constructed, "a poor thing, but all our own." Here was erected Fort St George, and the town which grew up was called Madras.

Across the Atlantic went many Puritans who disliked Laud's innovations, not to trade, but to settle and to worship according to their own ideas. The largest colony was Massachusetts, north of the settlement of the Pilgrim Fathers at New Plymouth, which later on was absorbed by it. These men did not emigrate for liberty of conscience: they persecuted those who disagreed with them; Roger Williams left them and founded Rhode Island for real liberty of conscience. The most tolerant colony of all was the Roman Catholic settlement in Maryland, named after Henriette Marie; it was planted by Lord Baltimore north-east of Virginia, and, like Virginia, became rich through tobacco. Both these were aristocratic and planting colonies; the New England Puritans were self-governing farmers.

The Eleven Years in Ireland and Scotland. Wentworth was sent by Charles to Ireland as Lord Deputy. He ruled as a despot, but Ireland prospered under him. He developed the cultivation of flax and the linen industry in Ulster. He had at Dublin a Parliament in which sat both Protestant settlers and native Irish Catholics. He raised and trained a small but excellent army. It was in Ireland that he adopted as his motto the word "thorough," by which he meant thorough efficiency and thorough devotion to the king. In 1639 he was created Earl of Strafford, and by that name he is best known.

In Scotland James I had done something to strengthen the Bishops, though the nation generally was Presbyterian. Laud, at this period, did not originate a policy of forcing on the Scots a government by Bishops, but he supported the Scottish Bishops in their attempt to introduce a Prayer Book closely resembling the English. The Presbyterians were violently stirred; there was a riot in St Giles' in Edinburgh, and a movement was started to sign a National Covenant, from which its supporters are often called Covenanters. There was no religious tyranny on the part of the Scottish Episcopalians; indeed, the Presbyterians, who were the majority of the nation, were rather inclined to play the part of tyrants in objecting to the minority using the Prayer Book. Many Scottish mercenaries in the Swedish service were recalled from Germany. Alexander Leslie was soon in command of a large army encamped on Duns Law near the Tweed. It was open revolt, and the operations which followed are known as the first Bishops' War.

Meeting of the Long Parliament. The disturbances in Scotland began the struggle in England which ended in civil war. To face Leslie's Scots Charles could only put into the field the untrained militia of the northern counties. He had no money, consequently he had to make a humiliating treaty with the Scots, and to call a Parliament. The Commons, led by John Pym, demanded redress of grievances, especially the abolition of ship money, Charles wanted at once a large grant of money, and refused to promise anything. He dissolved the Parliament, which hence is known as the Short Parliament. The Second Bishops' War followed, in which the English levies broke and fled before the Scots. Charles was quite powerless, made a second treaty with the Scots, and finally summoned the Long Parliament, November 1640.

This celebrated body was not the longest Parliament in our history; it sat for eight years, and in a mutilated shape for five more, whereas the Cavalier Parliament of Charles II lasted for eighteen, meeting at irregular intervals. Nor was it composed of violent radicals, but mainly of country gentlemen and lawyers who were devoted to legal government. Pym took the lead, Hampden of ship-money fame was the most popular member, and no one then guessed that the silent member for Cambridge, Oliver Cromwell, would leave a deeper mark on history than either Hampden or Pym.

First Acts of the Long Parliament. At once the assembly set to work. The Triennial Act was passed, if in future a king should try to govern without a parliament for a period of three years, arrangements were made by which elections should be held without the need of waiting for the king's command. Next Parliament voted that it could not be dissolved without its own consent. This was vastly important; the merchants would not lend money unless they had security that Parliament would not be dismissed, for Charles might repudiate the loans. Everything that had been complained of was abolished, once and for ever; forced loans, ship money, Star Chamber, High Commission Court, Court of the North, Council of Wales. Strafford and Laud were impeached. The case against Laud languished, and he lay in the Tower; he was finally executed in the middle of the civil war.

How it got rid of Strafford. It was hard to find any real evidence against Strafford. He was supposed to be guilty of advising Charles in all his illegal conduct; yet it was Noy who had suggested ship money, and in any case advice, however bad, can hardly be called treason, especially when it is given in the personal interest of the king. Strafford could not be justly impeached on "common fame," that is to say, on his general bad reputation as a counsellor of evil. The only definite accusation was that he had advised Charles to use the Irish army for the subjugation of "this kingdom"; Pym said that "this" meant England; Strafford that it meant Scotland, when that country was engaged openly in the Bishops' War. Finding themselves in difficulties the Commons dropped the impeachment, and brought up a Bill of Attainder. They were determined to get rid of their enemy somehow. The bill passed the Commons and the Lords; would the king sign it? Charles with incredible weakness sacrificed Strafford as a scape-goat to popular vengeance, and signed the bill. So by Act of Parliament Strafford was declared to be tainted and unfit to live. Such a process is the antipodes of justice. Law is general, defines who is a traitor, and fixes a penalty; a jury finds if a particular man is guilty, and a judge passes sentence. But an Act of Parliament naming a particular man reverses the process of law. Popular outcry demands a victim; so Strafford is executed. We contrast the case of Thomas Cromwell, who was attainted when he lost the king's favour. "Put not your trust in Princes" was Strafford's own comment

Church Question and Army Question. So far we have not come to the causes of the Civil War. All the worst evils of tyranny had been abolished. Strafford had been put out of the way. But there remained a profound feeling of mistrust; Charles might yet make another attempt to over-ride the laws. Still there was nothing tangible about which to fight. So far Parliament had been practically unanimous. Now parties were formed. There were the out-and-out Royalists; there were Royalists and Churchmen, who had opposed Strafford, yet now rallied to the King and to the Established Church, chief among whom was Sir Edward Hyde, the majority of the House were either Presbyterian, or else Churchmen with strong puritanical leanings, who wished to set up a Presbyterian Church on the Scottish model; and there was a small but strong body of Independents, led by Cromwell and Harry Vane, who were for neither Bishops nor Presbyters, but wished each Puritan congregation to be free to govern itself and worship as it liked. The real cause of war was the Church question. Two bills were brought up; the Root and Branch Bill would have destroyed the whole form of church government; the Bishops' Exclusion Bill would have turned the bishops out of the House of Lords.

Secondly, there was the Army question. Poor weapon as it was, the militia was yet the one legal force of the country, and the King alone could call it out. On Strafford's execution the Roman Catholics of Ireland broke into revolt, turned upon the Protestant settlers, and committed many atrocities. England was excited, and doubtless much exaggeration prevailed, as is usual in such cases, as to the extent and enormity of the atrocities. Troops had to be sent to Ireland; but were they to be controlled by King or by Parliament? A Militia Bill was brought in, by which Parliament was to be empowered to give commissions to militia officers. Charles would have nothing to do with it.

An appeal to Public Opinion. In November 1641 after one year of session the Commons drew up a remarkable document, the Grand Remonstrance. It was a sort of catalogue of all the wrong deeds of Charles' past life, an unfair attack such as appeals only to prejudice and hate. It was a cry made to the public at large, setting the king's misdeeds in the worst possible light, and implying that he never would rule properly in the future. It was passed by a majority of only eleven votes after very fierce debate. It was then printed and circulated throughout the country. It made Charles and the Royalists very bitter, and promoted a feeling such as could only lead to war. When men's minds were thus inflamed, quiet argument was no longer possible. Charles simply had no chance to show that he either could or would rule by law after Strafford's death. For a short time the violence of his enemies made him really popular.

Charles appeals to direct force. Then he too did a violent thing which made war inevitable. Pym and Hampden had undoubtedly looked to Scotland for support, and Charles accused them of treasonable correspondence during the Bishops' War. But he made a great mistake; for he ordered them and three others to be impeached; whereas impeachment was the method by which the Commons attack a king's ministers. The Court of the King's Bench was always open for a king who wished to accuse a subject, as in Sir John Eliot's case. Next he went down in person from Whitehall to the House, attended by armed cavaliers, to secure the arrest of the five members. A warning had been received just in time; the five slipped out and were rowed down to the City. Charles entered the House, and found that "the birds were flown." Lenthall, the Speaker, fell on his knees, but refused to tell him where they were. Next day the king went down to the City, and the Lord Mayor in his turn refused to surrender them. A paper was thrown into his coach, and it bore the ominous words, "To your tents, O Israel." The excitement of these days entirely effaced the momentary popularity that Charles had enjoyed. He left London, never to return except as a prisoner. This was in January 1642; in August he set up his standard at Nottingham.

THE CIVIL WAR

1642. EDGEHILL.	1643. GLOUCESTER.
1644. MARSTON MOOR.	1645. NASEBY.
1646. NEWARK	1647. HOLMBY HOUSE.
1648. SECOND CIVIL WAR.

While King and Parliament are arming, let us look at the chances and resources on either side. In war, as in games, those will win who can last out; a good start counts for much, but the tug comes when the reserves are put in. The King had the Churchmen, the majority of the nobles and gentry, also a strong minority of the House of Commons who migrated to Oxford to join him. For Parliament were all the Puritans, whether Presbyterian or Independent, a few puritanical Churchmen, a considerable minority of nobles and gentry, and the majority of the House of Commons. Many country districts, the north, the midlands, part of the west and south-west, were Royalist; but the richer eastern counties were Parliamentary. Most of the towns were strongly Puritan, not only London and the rich ports such as Hull and Bristol, but also country towns such as Gloucester and Taunton. The effect of this was that the King waged war on his capital, Parliament on income. The nobles and gentry, the colleges at Oxford, the King and Queen themselves, could only sell their jewels and plate, and cut down their oak trees, once; even then it was hard to find buyers. Parliament drew a steady yearly income from the ports and other towns in the richest counties, and could borrow, because they were able to repay. Each side was strongest where the country militia was favourable to it, and where the gentry armed their farmers and servants for either side. Each tried to secure the services of old soldiers who had learnt the art of war on European battlefields, George Monk was a royalist and a good example of the best type of English officer trained in Holland, in Dugald Dalgetty Sir Walter Scott has painted the common soldier of fortune. Militiamen, volunteers, or English mercenaries, mostly at first joined the King. The decisive question was, which side would in the long run organize the best professional army out of such material? It has been cleverly said that in 1642 both armies were composed of amateurs, and Rupert and his horsemen were the better amateurs. In the end Cromwell trained his yeomen to be the better professional soldiers. The Royalists are always known as Cavaliers; their opponents as Roundheads,—the name being given them because they cut their hair short in somewhat showy contrast to the long locks of the Cavaliers.

First Year: Rupert's charge at Edgehill. After some months of preparation came the only action of 1642, fought at Edgehill in the south midlands. Charles commanded in person on one side, Lord Essex on the other. The details of the battle show the character of the men. Rupert was Charles' nephew and son of the unlucky Elizabeth and the Elector Palatine; he has a real place in military history, and was not merely rash and hot-tempered: he was the first to charge at the gallop, sword in hand, without waiting to fire from the saddle, as European cavalry invariably did. He broke the Parliamentary horse of the left wing and threw terror into their ranks, but his own men and horses were much knocked about by their own impetus, were blown, and unable to rally for a second charge. The clumsy foot in the centre of each army, half pikemen, half musketeers,—the musket was a heavy and awkward weapon, slow to load, and fired from a crutch by a smouldering match,—could do little to secure victory, but the King's foot had the worst of it at push of pike. A small body of good Parliamentary horse, experienced in fighting abroad, prevented absolute rout. It was a drawn battle, but a moral victory for the dashing Cavaliers because of the terror that they inspired.

Prince Rupert, Cavalier

Cromwell saw this. He told his cousin Hampden that they must raise and train a steady cavalry of thorough Puritans, whose religious devotion would match the Cavaliers' enthusiastic loyalty. Meanwhile the way to London lay open. Charles advanced, but the citizens turned out and ran up entrenchments which he dared not storm. Then both sides went into winter-quarters.

Second Year: Gloucester, Lincolnshire. In 1643 there were many thousands of men in arms on each side. There were small local armies, and every old castle or manor-house was a military centre. The difficulty was to combine such forces, to persuade the men to march away from their own homes, in fact to create a permanent field-army. Charles' strategy was quite good. His own army from Oxford raided towards London, and defeated and killed Hampden at Chalgrove. A second army under Ralph Hopton over-ran Devon and Somerset, won several victories, and captured several Puritan towns of the south-west. Rupert, coming from Oxford, stormed Bristol. A third army under the Marquis of Newcastle beat Lord Fairfax and his son Sir Thomas Fairfax in Yorkshire, and drove them back into Hull. Now was the moment for a united advance on London, as Charles wished. But the northerners did not like to leave Hull uncaptured, or the south-westerners to leave Plymouth. This fatal inability to combine lost Charles his chance.

Instead he attacked Gloucester, an important place because it commanded the first bridge over the Severn and was a gateway into Wales, where he got good recruits, but far less important than London. The Parliamentarians made a great effort. Lord Essex filled up his ranks by enlisting the trained bands of London, marched wide north of Oxford, reached and relieved Gloucester. But on his return he was cut off by Charles at Newbury, on the Kennet in Berkshire, where runs the main road from Bristol to London. The trained bands were not professional soldiers, yet standing close with their long pikes they beat off Rupert's best horsemen. Thence Essex proceeded unmolested to London.

Such trained bands were useful for a short campaign and showed much courage. But unless the men would enlist for permanent service, they were good only for an emergency. The army of Lord Essex was about as bad as it could be, when the Londoners went back to their daily occupations. The really most useful work of this year was being done in the eastern counties, seven of which formed the Eastern Association. Not only did they combine, thus getting over the difficulty of service outside the county, but they had Cromwell at their head. He devoted himself to scientific professional training, secured officers of foreign experience, and himself both learning and teaching soon became an able cavalry leader. He succeeded because he deserved to succeed. His cavalry, in particular, he trained on the model of the Swedish armies; and as he had told Hampden, he sought recruits among the gentry and yeomen of Puritan life who put their conscience to the work and submitted to discipline. They were mostly Independents in religion. With them he marched into Lincolnshire, overpowered the Cavaliers there, and repulsed the forces sent from Yorkshire against him. The battles were on a small scale, but the steadiness of the men and the skill of Cromwell promised great things for the future.

Alliance of Parliament and Scots. Pym was dying, but his last work for the cause was to negotiate with the Scots. Their aid was much wanted in the north. A treaty was signed, known as The Solemn League and Covenant. A Scottish army was to march into England and to take the pay of the English Parliament; in return a Church was to be established in England "according to the example of the best reformed churches and according to the Word of God." Harry Vane, who conducted the negotiations, got these words to be inserted. Obviously there was trouble in store, for the Scots would insist that a "Presbyterian" Church like their own was meant, and the English might deny it, and indeed did deny it.

Charles on his side arranged an armistice with the Irish Catholics, and brought over to England some regiments thus released.

An Exquisite, 1646

Third Year: Marston Moor, Lostwithiel. The general strategy was somewhat changed in 1644. Charles had organized a fairly good permanent force which he could use as his main field-army in any direction, while local forces would hold the castles and towns which were for him. But the year opened badly. Thomas Fairfax defeated in Cheshire the regiments brought from Ireland, and Monk was taken prisoner. The Scots under Alexander Leslie, Earl of Leven, and his kinsman David, came over the border, joined the Fairfaxes in Yorkshire, and laid siege to York; the Eastern Counties' army, under Lord Manchester and Cromwell, having cleared Lincolnshire, also moved up to York. Against the three combined armies Charles detached Rupert from Oxford. By a quick and clever march through Cheshire and Lancashire, over the Pennines, and circling round to the north, Rupert outwitted

Pikeman and musketeer, 1645

the Parliamentarians, who were expecting him from the south-west and had broken up the siege to meet him. He relieved York and pushed on at once after them. It is the fashion to accuse him of recklessness. But in truth to follow up an outwitted enemy shows decision of character; only it might have been wiser to have given the Marquis of Newcastle and the relieved garrison of York a little more time to recruit their strength.

On July 2 the armies faced each other on Marston Moor. Rupert and Newcastle mustered some 7000 horse and 11,000 foot on the field, the combined Parliamentarians 7000 horse and 22,000 foot. Late in the evening the Parliamentarians attacked. Cromwell and the Eastern Counties' horse on the left wing broke Rupert's right; up flew Rupert himself with the reserve; then Cromwell's second line charged under the temporary command of David Leslie. The charge at a good round trot and the readiness of the second line to rally the first were typical of Cromwell's methods. His wing, completely victorious, was halted in order that he might look round. Meanwhile the cavalry of Fairfax had been routed by the Royalist left; the foot were struggling in the centre with varying success. Cromwell crossed behind the Royalists, charged and broke their victorious left, and then turned on the foot. This was the first crushing victory in the war, and was entirely due to Cromwell's discipline and steadiness. Rupert after it nicknamed him "Old Ironsides," and the name stuck to his cavalry. But at once there broke out a feeling of jealousy, neither the Scots nor the English Presbyterians liked to think that the Independents, Cromwell and his men, had won the day. York immediately surrendered.

Charles in his turn had pursued Lord Essex into the south-west, and surrounded his army at Lostwithiel, a few miles inland from Fowey in Cornwall. Essex and his cavalry escaped, his infantry surrendered. Charles returning victorious from the south, Manchester and Cromwell coming from the north to help Essex, met at the second battle of Newbury. The action was drawn, but it is important because of a violent quarrel which ensued between Manchester and Cromwell.

Fourth Year: the New Model at Naseby. Early in 1645 Parliament passed the Self-Denying Ordinance, by which members of both Houses laid down their commissions. It is called an "ordinance," because without the King's signature it could not be an "act." The object was to get rid of Lords Essex and Manchester and others, who were accused of incompetence or slackness, but of course Cromwell lost his commission for a time. Then Parliament organized an army on a New Model; it was to be a standing field-army, regularly paid and ready to march anywhere, when ordered; the horse were chiefly drawn from the

Cromwell's Ironside

Ironsides of the Eastern Association, the foot from various armies; men could be impressed, if necessary. The number was at first fixed at 7000 horse and 14,000 foot. Sir Thomas Fairfax was Lord-General, and a special ordinance of Parliament reinstated Cromwell as Lieutenant-General for the cavalry.

England: Civil Wars

The New Model first met the Royalists at Naseby in Northants. Charles' army was by no means contemptible, for he had kept it together for some considerable time, but it was only 7000 strong. Fairfax and Cromwell had 14,000 in action, but the foot were mostly raw impressed men. Again Cromwell's steady charge at the trot triumphed, this time on the right wing; he halted and re-formed to attack the Royalist foot; Rupert's gallop on his right broke the horse opposed to him, but he took too long to re-form. Charles' army no longer existed, his baggage and casket of letters fell into the hands of his enemies.

The Scots under Leslie and the New Model under Fairfax had now no field-army before them. They beat various small bodies, and proceeded to capture at their pleasure the castles and towns where there were garrisons of Royalists. In the autumn Bristol fell, and all organized resistance was at an end. During the war hitherto the artillery had not been useful; often quite weak castles, not to mention the solid Edwardian fortresses, had defied whole armies. Now heavy guns were used, and the castles were breached and then stormed.

One gleam of hope remained. James Graham, Marquis of Montrose, an old Covenanter who had been disgusted by Presbyterian intolerance, raised the Highlanders for the King. In 1644 and 1645 he won a series of most brilliant victories. But Highlanders were difficult men to manage; they liked to scatter after a victory to take their booty home, and they preferred to ravage the lands of the Campbells, the chief Presbyterian clan, rather than move south. David Leslie was recalled from England, and overwhelmed Montrose at Philiphaugh near Peebles. In obedience to the preachers Leslie stained his honour by murdering some prisoners; but Montrose escaped.

Charles prisoner of the Scots. With no resting place for the sole of his foot Charles surrendered in May 1646 to the Scots, who were then besieging Newark-on-

Trent. The last of the cavaliers to lay down his arms was Sir Jacob Astley. "Now," he said, "you may go play, unless you will fall out amongst yourselves." The troubles of the victors had begun; let us see what divisions there were among them.

There was the Scottish army, which had entered England under the terms of the Solemn League and Covenant on purpose to establish here a Church "according to the example of the best reformed churches and according to the Word of God." There was the Presbyterian majority in the English Parliament, backed by London and by most of the towns, who also desired the establishment of such a Church, which both they and the Scots interpreted to mean a Presbyterian Church. But there was also a minority in Parliament, composed of Independents, who acted with almost all the officers and men of the New Model, and wanted no established Church at all. Parliament was beginning in London and Lancashire to set up Presbyterianism. What was it exactly that the Independents disliked? No Bishops, no Prayer Book, no Royal Supremacy—these tenets were acceptable to all Puritans. But as in Geneva under Calvin, so in Scotland, the Kirk interfered in private life, dictated what should be believed as God's Word, and claimed the right of punishing vice. The General Assembly domineered over the Scottish Parliament, and practically made itself the Government. It was this interference in both private life and politics that the Independents feared. John Milton wrote "New Presbyter is but old Priest writ large." They had opposed Laud and what they had considered the priestly tyranny of the older Church. They did not allow that "a Church according to the Word of God" meant Presbyterianism, which seemed to them to be equally tyrannical. The Scots would retort that their army had been, therefore, brought to fight against Charles under false pretences.

For the time the Scots held the king as their prisoner. Their best preachers argued with him: would he accept the Covenant? He held his own, he could not possibly repudiate the Church of England for which he had fought for four years. At most he would only consent to an establishment of Presbyterianism for three years on trial. In despair the Scots offered to hand him over to the English Parliament, if the arrears of pay due to them were forthcoming. It is unfair to say that they "sold their king for gold." When Charles gave himself up to one of two allies, it was as good as surrendering to the other. The money was really owing. £200,000 were paid down, and he was handed over. The Scots withdrew to Scotland.

Charles prisoner of Parliament. He was lodged at Holmby House in Northamptonshire, and guarded by Commissioners from Parliament. During the first half of 1647 the same arguments went on. Parliament wanted him to co-operate with them in establishing Presbyterianism in England; he refused steadily. Secondly, would he consent to Parliament having control of the militia? Prisoner as he was, he clung to that control as the most valuable right of all kings before him; it seemed foolish to argue about so paltry a force as the militia, when the New Model was strong and armed, but it was the only legal force of the country.

The New Model Army had been created by Parliament, and disbandment was now ordered by Parliament. The war being ended, the body which had ended it should be dissolved. But Parliament did not pay up the arrears of wages, and would not give an indemnity. If once the soldiers were disbanded, they would certainly never see their arrears, if they had no indemnity, they might be prosecuted at law for violence, for damage done to crops, and for goods or horses seized during the war. The officers and many of the men, at least in the cavalry, were of a good class, were educated, and had studied their Bibles. They could argue on religious questions as well as any preacher, and thought themselves quite competent to settle both Church and State; they had their debating society, and their speeches have been preserved for us. Cromwell's conduct has been much criticised. At one time in the House of Commons he said that he would make them disband. "Ay, marry they would at his command." Then after much agony of mind, much searching in prayer to find "what was the Lord's Will," he finally put himself at the head of the discontented soldiers; the refusal to grant them their pay decided his action. Fairfax quietly fell in with his views. A party of horse under Cornet Joyce seized the person of Charles at Holmby House, June 1647.

Charles prisoner of the Army. The leaders of the Army tried to come to terms with their prisoner. Since they had defied Parliament, they were openly rebels. From Charles alone could they obtain a legal position, and thus once more have right on their side. A paper was drawn up, mainly by Ireton, called The Heads of the Proposals. If the king would acknowledge them as his officers, they would restore him; they also demanded a free Parliament, and full freedom of conscience except for Roman Catholics. But, much as Charles disliked the Presbyterians, he hated the victorious Army far more. He could understand his own authority, or even the authority of Parliament as opposed to him, but the Army were rebels against both. Once more Cromwell was in agony of mind. The soldiers called on him to break off dealings with Charles, to put himself at their head and march on London. He could not, he said, act without authority, "if it be but an hare swimming over the Thames"; that is, he wanted some assurance, even the very weakest, that the Army had right and not only might on their side.

But the Army was not entirely united. The party of the Levellers, headed by Colonel Lilburne, put forward their views in another paper, The Agreement of the People. The Nation, or Public Opinion, was a higher authority than either King or Parliament. They talked about "natural rights," and demanded that a new and free Parliament should be elected, every man to have a vote. Let Cromwell put himself at their head with such a manifesto. But the officers, Fairfax, Cromwell, and Ireton in particular, were a military aristocracy; they could not understand that a trooper had "natural rights" like an officer, or a mere labourer like a gentleman of property. They put down mutiny, when it appeared, with a strong hand and weeded out Levellers from the ranks.

The Army, taking Charles with them, marched on London. Eleven of the most important members of the Commons fled, and Parliament was overawed. Charles was lodged at Hampton Court; thence he escaped to Carisbrooke in the Isle of Wight, and might have gone to the Continent. But he thought that his enemies were so divided that he would "enjoy his own again," if there were a new rising. He entered into an Engagement with the Scots for a three years' trial of Presbyterianism, and hoped that old Presbyterian soldiers would join with the Cavaliers to rise against the domineering Army. Meanwhile the queen and others were trying to bring in Irish Catholics or foreign mercenaries. The genuine Cavaliers did not all like the idea of appealing to Scots or Irish or other foreigners. There was a general feeling that Charles was intriguing and insincere in this effort to set his enemies against each other. Had he quietly refused, prisoner as he was, to negotiate with either Presbyterians or Army, it would have been better for his reputation.

Second Civil War: Colchester. Yet so great was the fear of military despotism and of the Army itself governing England, that the Royalists rose in 1648 both in South Wales and in Kent; some Scots crossed the border, over 20,000 strong, but not the best soldiers of Scotland and not the thorough Presbyterians; also the fleet mutinied. But London and the English Presbyterians did not rise. The Army was ready and admirably disciplined; the insurgents were scattered, though numerous. Fairfax drove the Royalists from Kent into Essex, besieged them in Colchester, and captured it after a long and desperate resistance, the leaders were executed. Cromwell, after reducing the castles of South Wales, pushed up north. He marched round by Yorkshire, and over the Pennines to the rear of the Scots as they straggled through Lancashire; drove them in a three days' running fight from Preston through Wigan to Warrington, and finally captured more prisoners than he had men in his own army.

Pride's purge and the end. Cromwell's mind was profoundly stirred by this renewal of war. There might be a third and a fourth rising; the Royalists and Presbyterians might yet combine, and he had a fear of the ultimate triumph of either the old Church or Presbyterianism, each of them tyrannical and opposed to liberty of conscience. So he screwed up his determination to put "the man of blood" out of the way. He took the law into his own hands with his eyes open. To prevent any kind of religious tyranny, he imposed himself on the nation as a military tyrant. Colonel Pride purged, or turned out, all the Presbyterian members from the House. Fifty-three Independent members remained, commonly known as the Rump; they disregarded the House of Lords, created a special High Court of Justice, and brought Charles before it. He refused to plead, was condemned as a murderer and traitor, and executed on January 30, 1649.

The quiet and dignified conduct of Charles during the last few weeks of his life, and his execution by a body of men who had no lawful right, made him a martyr. Everything was forgotten, whether the Engagement with the Scots, or the attempt to bring in Irish and foreigners. Similarly Cromwell's services in preventing the establishment of Presbyterianism were forgotten. Sooner or later, if military rule were to continue, both Monarchy and Church would be restored, so great was the feeling of revulsion. Cromwell, having in all earnest tried to come to terms with Charles and to get some show of authority upon his side, in despair of knowing what else to do had put him out of the way.

THE COMMONWEALTH

FIVE YEARS OF THE RUMP, 1648—1653.

DROGHEDA, 1649 DUNBAR, 1650.

WORCESTER, 1651. DUTCH WAR, 1652.

FIVE YEARS OF THE PROTECTORATE, 1653—1658.

JAMAICA, 1655 DUNKIRK, 1658.

TWENTY MONTHS OF INTERREGNUM, SEPT. 3, 1658.

MONK CROSSES THE TWBBD, JANUARY 1, 1660.

Cromwell in Ireland : Drogheda. Ever since 1641, when after Strafford's execution the Irish had risen and massacred many English settlers, there had been war and confusion in Ireland. The Royalist Protestants were led by the Marquis of Ormonde, the head of the Anglo-Norman family of the Butlers; there were the Presbyterians of Ulster; and there were the Roman Catholic confederates under Owen Roe O'Neill, a most energetic soldier. After the execution of Charles the Royalists and the Catholics combined to acknowledge his son. The Rump was forced to send over in 1649 a large army to put an end to anarchy, and chose Cromwell to command. He stormed the towns of Drogheda and Wexford, putting to the sword the garrisons and priests.

It is hard for us to understand Cromwell's mind. Like all Puritans he had been educated to regard all Roman Catholics as outcasts, he knew all the stories of the cruelties of the Spanish Inquisition, of Mary Tudor's persecution, and of the massacres in Germany during the Thirty Years' War, besides the Irish massacres of 1641. At least half of the garrison of Drogheda were Royalist Protestants, but he would have considered them as bad as Catholics, because allied with them. According to the rules of war in those days no soldiers had a right to quarter if they defended an indefensible position. The order to kill was given by him in the heat of battle, not in cold blood. There was no indiscriminate slaughter of civilians or women by his order, but as in all wars some non-combatants suffered. Soldiers of the New Model killed priests and friars without orders. Yet it remains that the massacres of Drogheda and Wexford were truly awful and have left evil memories; many were massacred even after being admitted to quarter, and others were burnt out of a church tower where they had taken refuge.

Cromwell gradually conquered south-eastern Ireland; returning to England next year he left Ireton, his son-in-law, to complete the conquest. Lands were confiscated on a large scale in the centre and south, and were chiefly given to officers and soldiers in compensation for arrears of pay. The native Irish landowners were driven in thousands across the Shannon, which thus became the "pale" or boundary. Thus the national bitterness against England was intensified, and the English settlers became a sort of armed garrison in the country.

Cromwell in Scotland: Dunbar. In 1650 young Prince Charles, unable to get help from the Roman Catholic Irish, listened to the proposals of the Presbyterian Scots. He had to subscribe to the Covenant, which his father had died rather than do. He was forced to disown the noble Montrose, who was captured and executed like a felon. He had to listen to the usual long sermons and to hear his father abused. But he had David Leslie and the whole fighting force of Scotland on his side. Unluckily for him the interfering preachers forced Leslie to dismiss many good officers, and to replace them by "godly men" who knew little of war.

There was religious jealousy between the Presbyterian Scots and the Independents of the English Army and Rump, because Presbyterianism was not enforced in England; national jealousy was ever present; personal jealousy between Cromwell and Leslie existed ever since the battle of Marston Moor. Fairfax resigned rather than fight his old comrades in arms, and Cromwell was thus raised to be Lord General. He advanced along the coast road towards Edinburgh, while a fleet kept in touch with him and furnished supplies. But at first Leslie entirely outwitted him, following the old plan of Robert Bruce and refusing a pitched battle, so as to starve out the invaders. Unable to storm Edinburgh, Cromwell was forced to fall back towards Berwick.

Between Edinburgh and the little port of Dunbar there is a wide and rich plain from the foot of the moors to the sea; from Dunbar eastwards to Berwick the moors come right down to the coast and are intersected by many steep ravines. Cromwell retreated easily to Dunbar, where he halted, while Leslie held the high ground above him, for he dared not try to cross those ravines with Leslie close to him. The only way out of the trap would have been to ship his men in detachments and to endure a siege at Dunbar. But the Scots were in their position suffering from exposure to the rain. Once more the preachers interfered, and ordered Leslie to come down to level ground and to blockade Cromwell closely. In the night Cromwell shifted his position, and at daybreak on September 3, 1650, with his 11,000 men he fell upon Leslie's 22,000, rolled them up against the foot of the moor, and annihilated them as an army. It was an action only possible for highly trained veterans. The retreat on Berwick ceased, and Cromwell occupied Edinburgh and Leith.

The Scots invade England: Worcester. In 1651 Leslie raised more troops and was holding out in Stirling, the old centre of Wallace and Bruce. Again he refused battle, and Cromwell crossed the Forth by boat at Queensferry and advanced on Perth. Thereby the way to England was left open. Taking Charles with him Leslie made a dash southwards in the hope of rousing the English Royalists. Cromwell acted with energy; he left Monk to command in Scotland, sent Lambert ahead with cavalry, and himself followed. Lambert moved quickly, and edged Leslie westwards towards the Severn away from the direct road to London. The Cavaliers, taken by surprise, did not rise in large numbers. Cromwell raised the militia as he advanced, and joining Lambert attacked in vastly superior force at Worcester. He won what he called his "crowning mercy" on the anniversary of Dunbar, September 3, 1651. Charles after many hair-breadth escapes at last reached Brighton, where he got a boat and landed in France on October 22, the loyalty of the many people who helped him to elude the close pursuit of Cromwell's horsemen was wonderful.

At this time, just after Cromwell had fought his last battle, there were in all some 70,000 soldiers in regular pay, whether in Ireland or Scotland or England. Ireton, and after him Henry Cromwell, had trouble in Ireland; but Monk battered down Stirling Castle, and by his straightforward character pacified the Scots. Gradually the numbers of the army were reduced. We must remember that since the New Model was first organized Cromwell had weeded out most of the Levellers and others of extreme views. Many old Cavaliers were enlisted. It was no longer solely an army of godly Puritans, but a strictly professional army. The love of fine uniforms and lace, and of long hair and waving plumes, made the men resemble the Cavaliers rather than the Roundheads of 1642. Red was the uniform colour for the foot, buff coats with red sashes marked the horse. The discipline was very strict. In military skill the Cromwellians were far above the standard of 1642, and many a reform had been introduced; for instance, the musket was lighter and fired without a crutch, and the pikemen could charge without disorder and were not only good in defence.

Meanwhile, ever since 1648, when some of the fleet had gone over to the king, and Rupert and others had taken to privateering, the Rump had been forced to build ships. Under the honest and clever administration of Harry Vane no fewer than 46 battleships were turned out between 1649 and 1653. An admiral of genius was found in Robert Blake, formerly a Puritan colonel, who chased Rupert and the Cavalier privateers off the high seas. Luckily indeed it was for England that this ship-building programme had had to be carried out, and that Blake had been discovered. A naval war was now threatening.

A Revolution in National Finance. The question of money was above every other question. The enormous army and the new navy had to be paid. Much was raised from the conquered Cavalier landowners, who were allowed to live on their estates if they "compounded," that is to say, if they paid large fines to avoid confiscation. But the proceeds of such fines were soon exhausted. The Rump required a steady permanent income, and this could only come from trade. So they passed the Navigation Act: no goods were to be brought into England from places outside Europe except in English ships or ships of the English colonies; there was to be no trade between England and a European country except in English ships or ships of the country concerned. Not only were merchants at once benefited, trade encouraged, and the yield from the customs increased; but also the colonial trade was greatly increased. Formerly a Dutch ship carried Virginian tobacco to Holland, whence it was re-exported to France or England; now all tobacco had to come straight to England, and much of it was re-exported from England. Therefore the new system hit the Dutch very hard, as they had the chief carrying trade of Europe. Of course the full effect of this financial revolution was not felt at once; our colonial empire was but growing from small beginnings. Nor did England get very rich immediately, nor Holland very poor. But the rivalry between the two countries, dating from the Amboyna massacre of 1623, became much more bitter because of this Navigation Act.

The first war against the Dutch. The Thirty Years' War had come to an end in 1648, and also the old long struggle between Holland and Spain. The Dutch wished to economise and cut down their navy. On the death of William II^d of Orange they abolished the stadtholdership, and set up a Republic in which the rich merchants had most power. They were not ready for a new war. But now the Rump, engaged in the task of putting down French privateers in the Channel, claimed the right to search Dutch ships. This claim, coming on top of the Navigation Ordinance, goaded them into war in 1652.

The English navy was new and not very scientific; the Dutch were much more experienced, but were hampered by their recent policy of economy. Moreover the Dutch merchantmen had to run the gauntlet the whole way along our coast from the Atlantic to Holland. Each battle at sea was fought in order to capture or to defend their merchantmen. Fierce hammer-and-tongs battles they were, too. Our "generals at sea," Blake and Monk, covered themselves with glory; if apparently beaten, they refitted and put to sea again. No victory such as Trafalgar was possible between these two evenly matched fleets. But the Dutch, having most to lose, suffered most in the long run.

Cromwell turns out the Rump. Beyond doubt Cromwell hated the idea of war between two Protestant nations; his enemies said that he was jealous of Vane and the navy. He had long been calling upon the Rump to dissolve itself; fifty men had no right to rule the country for ever. They claimed that if a new Parliament were called they should have seats in it without new election. There were ugly rumours that they made money by taking bribes from Cavaliers who had to compound for their lands. At last one day in 1653 Cromwell brought down some musketeers, left them outside, and entered the House with General Harrison. He got up to speak, strode up and down in his excitement, and, pointing at the members in turn, chid them roundly and called them by hard names. Then he told Harrison to bring in the soldiers. Mr Speaker Lenthall tried to frown defiance, even as he had defied Charles I on the occasion of the attempt to arrest the five members eleven years earlier. Harrison's men pulled him out of his chair. The House was cleared and the door locked. Next day some wag nailed up a paper: "This House is to be let, now unfurnished."

It was not long before peace was made with the Dutch. Under Cromwell's management they were brought to agree to the Navigation Ordinance and to the Right of Search, to salute the English flag, and to pay compensation for the Amboyna massacre. A few years earlier every one would have scoffed at the idea of their submission to such terms.

Cromwell as Lord Protector. After the ejection of the Rump a body of men were brought together by Cromwell and the officers, and called from the name of one of the members "Barebone's Parliament." It did little more than talk and was soon dissolved. Then the officers drew up a document, the Instrument of Government, by which Cromwell was to be Lord Protector; he was to have practically supreme control of the general government, of the army and navy and foreign policy; he was to call a Parliament once every three years, and it was to consist of a single House. Twice he summoned such a House, and twice he dissolved it, being just as unable to govern in harmony with Parliament as any of the Stuarts. But a very important point is that he summoned to it members from Scotland and Ireland; in fact the three countries were governed as one. Of course this was but an enforced union; the voluntary union between England and Scotland came fifty years later. Meanwhile Monk governed Scotland quietly and justly, and probably most of the Scots themselves were glad that he broke for a time the political power of the Presbyterian Church.

Cromwell was frankly a military despot governing for the nation's good, and was as "thorough" as Strafford. There was a greater measure of real liberty of conscience, except for Roman Catholics, and in a less degree for thoroughgoing Episcopalians, than England had ever enjoyed. The Presbyterians, prevented by force from persecuting others, were yet themselves free to worship as they wished. The Cavaliers were heavily taxed, but secretly could worship according to their forms. Ministers of any sect, Presbyterians, Baptists, or Independents, could preach as long as they satisfied the Triers, a board of men appointed to examine the fitness of ministers.

But the expense of Cromwellian rule was crushing. The annual peace revenue came to $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions, more than treble the amount of Charles' income during his eleven years of no Parliament. Yet even during peace this revenue did not cover expenses. The customs duties at the ports were not yet large enough to supply the nation's needs, even after the Navigation Ordinance came into force. The most violent thing that Cromwell did was to divide England into ten military districts, each under a Major-General, to secure payment of taxes, and especially a ten per cent. tax on the incomes of Cavaliers. But no government can possibly be carried on at an annual loss, or make up such loss by perpetually fining one class. In fact if Cromwell had lived for another five years he would have plunged England into bankruptcy; such is the final verdict of Dr S. R. Gardiner, the leading historian of this period.

Foreign Policy: War against Spain. Cromwell's reputation rests mainly upon his wars: he was the first who made England to be feared abroad. His Protestantism was strong and genuine, for he hated the Dutch war because waged by two Protestant nations on a mere question of commerce. His strong remonstrances against the persecution of some Swiss Protestants by the Duke of Savoy led to their restoration and liberty. He would have liked to put himself at the head of a great Protestant League,—such as Charles I and Buckingham tried to form in 1625, but had been prevented from forming by the Puritans of the Parliament, who had refused to vote supplies. But Cromwell was some ten years too late; the Thirty Years' War had ended in 1648. Nations might in the future fight for profit or glory; they were becoming less eager to fight for religion.

He sent Blake into the Mediterranean to suppress the Mohammedan pirates. Tunis was successfully attacked, and English trade protected. Here too he followed the policy of Charles I, for the Ship-money fleet had done something similar in 1637.

France and Spain were at war, as usual. Cardinal Richelieu had died in 1642 and Louis XIII in 1643. Louis XIV was young; his mother Anne and the Italian Cardinal Mazarin governed France; the great nobles, led by Prince Condé of the blood royal, rebelled against the Crown and called in aid from Spain. Would Cromwell make alliance with France or with Spain? At one time it seemed as if he would help Spain, in spite of his Protestant leanings. He demanded, as the price of his alliance, freedom for English merchants from the Spanish Inquisition and full right to trade with the Spanish West Indies. His terms were rejected. So he sent out a buccaneering expedition under Penn, father of the founder of Pennsylvania, in the track of Drake and Raleigh; the island of Jamaica was occupied, but was then considered to be of little value. Thereupon Spain declared war and Cromwell allied himself to Mazarin.

At sea Blake won new laurels. Following Drake's example he kept his fleet upon the enemy's coast, paralyzed his commerce, and sent home even more booty than Drake had ever seized. The booty was acceptable to Cromwell in the midst of his money troubles. But worn out by his tremendous exertions Blake at last died at sea. For the land war Cromwell, according to the terms of his alliance with Mazarin, sent 7000 infantry to join the French army of Marshal Turenne. In the battle of the Dunes, fought just outside Dunkirk in 1658, these English had the chief share in defeating the Spaniards. The town of Dunkirk fell, and was handed over to Cromwell as the price of his assistance.

Was Cromwell wise to help France? This policy has been much blamed. It is said that he helped to raise France and to depress Spain at just the critical moment, and thus to spoil the balance of power by throwing the weight of England into the wrong scale. But such critics forget that they know the subsequent history of France, and Cromwell did not. Let us remember our former argument, that Henri IV and Cardinal Richelieu, and Cardinal Mazarin, had been all in turn tolerant rulers, and the Edict of Nantes was in force, could Cromwell have possibly foreseen that young Louis XIV would nearly thirty years later violate that Edict and persecute the Huguenots? Moreover, the rebel French nobles with the aid of Spain seemed quite likely to overpower Mazarin; could Cromwell well have foreseen that after Mazarin's death, after victory over both the rebels and Spain, Louis XIV would become the strongest military despot in Europe? Cromwell was indeed responsible for the rise of France, but it was not possible for him to know how France would use her new strength.

On September 3, 1658, Oliver Cromwell died, at the age of 59: it was the day of Dunbar and of Worcester. Since he had nerved himself in 1647 to defy Parliament, his life had been one long mental strain. His signature at the end of his reign was barely legible, and shaky like that of an old man. Eleven years of agony of mind seeking to find out what was God's will wore him out. He knew that he ruled England without "authority," simply by the sword; and this he did deliberately to prevent worse things from happening, to keep both Stuarts and Presbyterians from seizing the power, and to prevent another civil war. Therefore, again to give the conclusions of our leading historian, Dr S. R. Gardiner, all Cromwell's services to England were negative; he broke down Charles I and the Royal Prerogative, he stopped Presbyterian tyranny in both England and Scotland, and he turned out the Rump which wished to sit for ever. He taught Europe that Englishmen could fight, though this may seem strange praise to give to a Puritan; on the other hand he made Englishmen hate the idea of a standing army maintained by overpowering taxation. Let us repeat that the expense of maintaining army and navy was so great that he was bringing England to the verge of bankruptcy; therefore he could make the might of England appear great in the eyes of foreigners, but was exhausting England's resources to do so. The army, some 70,000 strong in 1652, had fallen below 30,000 by 1658. To the navy had been added since 1649, whether new built or prizes from various enemies, over 200 ships of all classes; but economy was already spoiling its efficiency. Cromwell's love of freedom of conscience, his sincere piety, his refusal to make a great private fortune, were forgotten by those who could only see the red coats. He seriously damaged the very cause of Puritanism for which he lived and worked.

Yet we are forced to admire his manliness. He was no coarse-minded tyrant like Henry VIII. Like Blake, he thought it his duty "to prevent foreigners from fooling us." He was thorough, and a matchless organizer of victory. Yet he added to the permanent possessions of England only Jamaica, and it was not till after his death that the cultivation of the sugar-cane made Jamaica rich. In Ireland he intensified the national hatred.

Who shall succeed the Usurper? The old question of course recurs. We understand the succession of the eldest son in an old established monarchy; we can also understand the rule of a strong usurper; but for the son of an usurper to succeed by natural right is illogical. Other strong men think themselves quite capable of taking the usurper's place, as in this case did Generals Lambert and Fleetwood. Richard Cromwell, Oliver's eldest son, was declared Protector, and had the support of his brother Henry in Ireland and of Monk in Scotland. But he abdicated in May, 1659. The Rump was restored and made an effort to control the Army; Lambert turned it out again.

The destiny of England rested on the shoulders of one man, George Monk, a soldier of fortune from boyhood and ex-royalist, who after the execution of Charles served Cromwell as the only possible ruler. He had the true soldier's instinct to obey the existing government which gave him his pay, the government de facto; by serving it he served England, whether against the Scots by land or the Dutch by sea. On the other hand, Lambert had been a lawyer and had suddenly displayed great military skill during the civil war; his idea was that the soldiers should control the government and so provide their pay. The question would be settled by the red coats themselves of whom less than 30,000 were now in arms, but very many old soldiers were ready to join them. Would the majority of them think the same as Monk or as Lambert, prefer to be servants or masters? Anyhow no rising of Cavaliers had a chance against them, if they were united.

Monk was more fond of acting than of arguing. He gradually collected the troops in Scotland, got rid of all but loyal officers, and crossed the Tweed at Coldstream on January 1, 1660. His own regiment is still known as the Coldstream Guards. He had the support of the Presbyterians and the Scots, the officers of the fleet, the citizens of London and Hull and other ports, and old soldiers such as Fairfax who roused the militia of Yorkshire. But there was no fighting. Lambert's soldiers melted away. The Rump was once more restored, and when Monk reached London in February he found it sitting. At last he spoke, and declared for the restoration of the full Long Parliament as it had been before Pride's Purge; it declared for a Free Parliament and dissolved itself. Everybody knew that this meant the Restoration of the Stuart dynasty. Monk's wish to have a strong government de facto could only be satisfied by the restoration of the one legal government de jure. At least he had saved England from military rule, with endless civil war as an alternative.

CHARLES II, 1660—1685

THE CLARENDON CODE: 1661—1665.

PLAGUE, 1665. FIRE, 1666. DUTCH IN THE MEDWAY, 1667.

TRIPLE ALLIANCE, 1668. TREATY OF DOVER, 1670.

LAST DUTCH WAR, 1672—1674.

TEST ACT, 1673.

TEN THUNDEROUS YEARS: 1678—1688.

Charles met the envoys of the Free Parliament at Breda in Holland, and agreed to their conditions. This practically meant that the Restoration of the Monarchy was also the Restoration of Parliament. He bound himself to pay all the arrears of the army, to pardon his father's enemies, and to leave untouched the land-settlement; as he could only raise money through Parliament, and as the regicides could only be exempted from the general pardon by Parliament, Charles II was therefore clearly restored as a constitutional king. His main purpose in life is clear; he meant "never to set out on his travels again." Yet, short of defying the nation to execute him or to exile him, he meant to have as much power and as much pleasure as he could.

He landed and passed along the old Dover road towards London. On Blackheath he found the army drawn up, and through excited crowds who wore an oak-leaf and oak-apple as a royal badge he entered the city on May 29. Of course he had been hiding up an oak after Worcester in the month of September when the leaves were thick; May 29 is "oak-apple day" because the badge was worn then in 1660, in honour of his wonderful escape, but in that month the leaves would not be thick enough to hide any one. Scott gives a fine account of Charles' ride to London at the end of Woodstock.

Parliament at once exempted the regicides from the pardon, executed Harry Vane, though he had not been one of Charles I's judges, and had the bodies of Cromwell and others dug up. Lambert cringed and saved his life.

The Army Disbanded and Reconstituted. The first thing of all was to get rid of the big expensive army. Arrears of pay had to be met in full, and thus Charles began his reign by incurring a heavy debt. Naturally therefore economy was the chief consideration of Parliament. We so often hear the war policy of Cromwell praised in contrast to that of both Charles I and Charles II that it is necessary always to remember that neither of them ever had as much money to spend as he. The disbandment was carried out gradually by Monk, who was created Duke of Albemarle. The men disappeared peacefully into private life, but during the next few years there was ever a supply of good recruits available for war.

A very small army was retained and was the direct ancestor of our present Royal Army. Some needy Cavalier exiles were formed into a Life Guard, and a regiment of Foot Guards (known as the Grenadier Guards after Waterloo); Monk's own regiment was reconstituted as the Coldstream Guards; some Scottish mercenaries, lent by Louis XIV and kept in England, are now the Royal Scots, the 1st Foot; a similar corps of English mercenaries from Holland are now the Buffs or 3rd; the 1st regiment of Cavalry, and the 2nd and 4th of Foot, were originally the garrison of Dunkirk, and later on of Tangier. It must be added that the discipline was very bad, and that roughness and rowdiness prevailed such as Cromwell would never have tolerated.

The Episcopal Church as Restored. A new Parliament was elected and sat at intervals from 1661 to 1679. It is known as the Cavalier Parliament, for the temper of the nation was very strongly anti-Puritan. The Presbyterians had combined with the Cavaliers to recall Charles, not through love for the Stuarts, but chiefly from hatred of the Independents and the Army which had prevented the establishment of a Presbyterian Church. The restored Cavaliers took their revenge on both Presbyterians and Independents; men who had been reviled as "malignants" for several years, and had heard their executed king styled "the man of blood," were not likely to make a difference between the two sets of Puritans. Similarly after years of heavy fines, of exile in some cases, of compulsory Sabbath-observance and repression of pleasure and amusements, it was natural that the Cavaliers should sneer at Puritans and live a life of pleasure.

Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, was Chancellor¹; he had been an old opponent of Strafford when the Long Parliament first met, and had devotedly served Charles I after Strafford's death. It was a Restoration of Parliament as well as of King, but of a Parliament determined to govern solely in the interest of Cavaliers and of Church. To put back the Royalist nobles and gentry to the position that they had enjoyed in 1642 was impossible; Parliament could not afford to repay them for past compositions and fines. But to restore the old Church was possible. Four laws were passed which came to be known as the Clarendon Code, though Clarendon himself had advocated a more tolerant policy. By the Corporation Act only Churchmen might be members of town councils. By the Act of Uniformity all clergy had to accept the Prayer Book or quit their livings. The Conventicle Act forbade all meetings in chapels. The Five Mile Act exiled Puritan clergy from towns. The Code is hateful to our ideas of right; yet Puritans had treated the Churchmen roughly in their day of power.

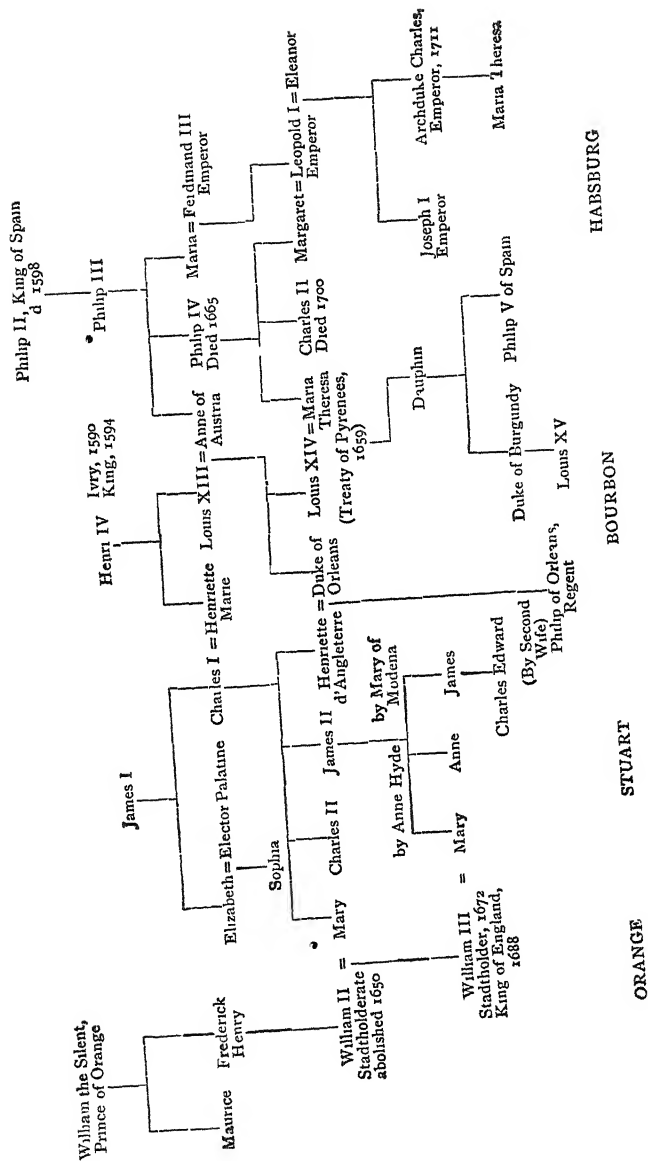

¹ Clarendon took his title from the little place in Wiltshire where Henry II issued the "Constitutions of Clarendon" just 500 years earlier.

From this time Protestants who are not Churchmen have usually been called Nonconformists. John Bunyan was imprisoned for many years in Bedford gaol, he was not, however, very badly treated; he was frequently allowed out on parole, and was released at last by the king's Indulgence.

Clarendon and the Portuguese Match. Portugal had regained freedom from Spain in 1640, and had received help from Cromwell. Charles now married a Portuguese princess, Catharine of Braganza; as her dowry he received Tangier and the island of Bombay. Tangier, though just outside the straits, may be considered our first Mediterranean possession for the protection of our commerce. Clarendon sold Dunkirk to Louis XIV, and the garrison was transferred to Tangier, where there was incessant war against the Moors; it was abandoned in its turn some twenty years later. Bombay was handed over to the East India Company, who made their headquarters there. Henceforward England was constantly the ally and protector of Portugal against Spain; yet the Portuguese merchants resented being forced to grant trade privileges as the price of English help.

Clarendon was very unpopular. He was a stiff and cold man of old-fashioned views; the gay young race of Cavaliers disliked him. His daughter, Anne Hyde, secretly married James Duke of York, Charles' brother. Charles and Catharine had no children; therefore people thought that Clarendon was scheming to make his daughter queen. By the sale of Dunkirk he was suspected of filling his own pockets.

In this reign the Carolinas were colonised, grants of land being made to Cavalier nobles and others; yet it was not till nearly a century later that the hot damp climate was found to be suitable for growing cotton. In the next Dutch war we shall find New Amsterdam conquered and re-named New York in honour of James; family names such as Roosevelt and Vanderbilt still remind us that New York was originally Dutch. Later the Quaker Penn, son of the conqueror of Jamaica, founded Pennsylvania, for the Quakers were the one sect of Nonconformists who accepted favours from the Stuarts.

Rise of France under Louis XIV. The Restoration of Charles corresponded with a new development of the royal power in France. The Treaty of the Pyrenees was made with Spain; the long period of wars between the French Crown and the French nobles backed by Spain was over; Louis XIV, reigning in reality as well as in name after Mazarin's death, was a stronger king than even Henri IV, or than Louis XIII when Richelieu was at his prime. Under Louis XIV many great men contributed to make France great. Colbert re-organized the finances so that the money might come to the king's treasury and not stick in the tax-gatherers' hands; he built roads and canals and ports, so as to utilise the vast natural wealth of France; he strengthened the colonies, and created a new royal navy. Louvois organized a national trained army such as Europe had never yet seen. Turenne was the great marshal, and left behind him a race of scientific officers. Vauban planned the fortresses. Poets and preachers made French literature a brilliant model for all countries. From this reign dates the ascendancy of the French language, phrases, and ideas; one hardly knows whether to attribute this most to the military or to the literary glory of France. At one time or another during the reign were annexed large tracts of land, Roussillon at the eastern end of the Pyrenees, Franche Comté bordering on Switzerland, Artois and a part of Flanders, containing the great cities of Lille, Arras, Cambrai, and Valenciennes, all at the expense of Spain; most of Alsace and Lorraine at the expense of Germany. Little cause for wonder is there that Louis should have been saluted as "Le Grand Monarque." His absolute power was such that he said of himself, "L'Etat, c'est Moi."

How would France use her new and growing power? Holland had been her old ally. Spain, the old enemy of both, had suddenly collapsed. England had been raised by Cromwell. The three strong powers began to look upon Spain, if we may use a phrase applied much later to Turkey by Tsar Nicholas, as "the sick man of Europe." The Spanish Netherlands lay between and seemed a tempting prize. The alliances of the next few years are puzzling, because neither England nor Holland could foresee what were Louis' designs. As a matter of fact, every possible combination was made: England fought Holland and France, then suddenly allied with Holland and Sweden against France, almost at once allied with France against Holland, and at last, when the aggressive and even persecuting designs of Louis were openly revealed, called in William III from Holland and finally ranged herself against France.

The Second War against the Dutch. But in the early days of Charles II France had not yet appeared to be dangerous. Our national rival seemed still to be Holland. Parliament passed a Navigation Act even stronger than the Rump's Navigation Ordinance. English and Dutch colonists fell out in both the East and the West Indies. The Dutch government was still republican under the lead of the brothers John and Cornelius de Witt, young William III of Orange was debarred from the stadtholdership. War first broke out on the coast of West Africa on account of some slave-trading stations. Then an English squadron seized New Amsterdam. In 1665 and 1666 some very fierce battles were fought at sea, where the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, and Monk opposed De Ruyter; it was the same heavy style of fighting as in the days of the Rump. Once Monk fought for four days and seemed to be beaten. He refitted, was out again six weeks later, and won a victory. As before, there was no crushing overthrow of either fleet.

Dutch and English ships in the Thames

During these years occurred two notable disasters. The Great Plague broke out in 1665, and the Fire of London in 1666. The two combined influenced the war very seriously. Parliament voted $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions one year, then $1\frac{1}{4}$, then $1\frac{3}{4}$, but it was impossible to collect the money; Londoners had buried their coin. Indeed it is wonderful that the fleets should have been so well equipped as they were in these two years. In 1667, just as conditions of peace were being discussed, the Council decided to lay up the ships in harbour. It was a terribly unwise policy, but intelligible. The defences of the harbours were in bad repair, and sailors and workmen were mutinous for lack of pay. Promptly De Witt ordered De Ruyter to sail for the estuary of the Thames. For two months the Dutch held the river and destroyed commerce; three days running they sailed up the Medway at high tide to Chatham, carried off the "Royal Charles," and burnt three other first-rates, besides doing great damage to smaller craft. London was in a panic. Monk went to the front, shamed the men back to their duty, and restored the batteries, so that the Dutch did not attack Chatham again. Shortly afterwards peace was made at Breda.

It is difficult to apportion the blame. Certainly Charles was amusing himself while the ships were burning at Chatham; he and his courtiers seemed to live for amusement. Samuel Pepys, an official at the Admiralty whose diary is well known, summed up the king very cleverly: "He has a bewitching kind of pleasure called sauntering. . . He hates the very sight or thought of business." Yet the appearance of sauntering was the mask of a clever brain. One can never be certain that Charles was only devoted to pleasure, and a careless air may be put on to hide real anxiety. At any rate want of ready money was the primary cause of the Medway disaster. The Treaty of Breda was not at all to the disadvantage of England. We kept New Amsterdam, otherwise New York,

Upnor Castle, north bank of the Medway, opposite to Chatham and secured the whole of the Dutch Colony on the North American coast. Charles was as keen as anyone to wipe out the disgrace ; indeed, if the negotiations of the next few years seem to be underhand, they were at least popular so far as Charles aimed at getting even with the Dutch.

George Monk

When money was again forthcoming, ships were built and our fleets were strong again ; up to 1673, some 140 ships, either new built or prizes from the Dutch, were added to the Navy.

This war ruined Clarendon. We saw that he was already unpopular because of the marriage of his daughter to James, and the sale of Dunkirk. Now people were ready to make him the scape-goat for plague and fire and naval disgrace. Impeachment was threatened. Charles, not being prepared to use the Royal Prerogative to shield him, gave him a hint to exile himself. He went to Jersey, and there finished his History of the Great Rebellion; the Clarendon Press at Oxford preserves his name.

Chatham

Another great man now quits the stage. George Monk, Duke of Albemarle, died full of years and honour on January 2, 1670; he had seen the tenth anniversary of his passage of the Tweed. Let a quotation from Pepys be his epitaph: "That blockhead Albemarle hath strange luck to be loved, though he be the heaviest man in the world, but stout and honest to his country."

Treaty with Holland against France. Louis had been so far the ally of Holland, though taking little share in the naval war as his fleet was only in the making. He had married a Spanish princess, renouncing all claim to the throne of Spain through her; yet, when Philip IV of Spain died in 1665, he claimed a part of the Spanish Netherlands. French armies over-ran Artois and the southern part of Flanders. Both the English and the Dutch were alarmed.

The English ambassador at Brussels was Sir William Temple, "an unusual man¹," who foresaw that England ought to give up all thought of revenge against Holland because of this new French danger. He talked of the growing might of France as "this great comet that is risen of late." He had a private talk with De Witt, came over to England to talk with Charles, and returning to Holland startled the world by making, in 1668, the Triple Alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden, against France. He was indeed an unusually clever man when he persuaded De Witt to give up Holland's old ally and make terms with Holland's old enemy. The action of Charles is easy to understand. He wanted to trick De Witt into a sense of false security, and to teach Louis that England's alliance was worth something; when Louis was ready to offer alliance to England, he would be on his side ready to break the Triple Alliance and then obtain revenge for the Medway disgrace. Of course two commercial rivals, who had fought each other so fiercely and so recently, could not long remain hearty allies.

Since Clarendon's fall Charles had had five ministers whose initials make up the word Cabal; it is a Hebrew word and signifies a body of secret conspirators. They were not at all like a modern "cabinet." Charles consulted all or some or none of them, as he chose. Clifford was a Roman Catholic; so also was Arlington, but he favoured alliance with Holland. Buckingham, son of Charles I's favourite,

"Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
Was everything by starts and nothing long,
But, in the course of one revolving moon,
Was chemist, fiddler, statesman, and buffoon²."

¹ Sir J. R. Seeley

² Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel

Ashley, Lord Shaftesbury, was a clever intriguer and an old Cromwellian. Lauderdale was secretary in Scotland, an old Covenanter turned Churchman, and therefore regarded as a renegade.

Treaty with France against Holland. Louis, in spite of the Triple Alliance, retained Artois and French Flanders. He was more angry with De Witt than with Charles, and soon was ready for a new bargain. Henriette Marie, mother of Charles and aunt of Louis, had always favoured an Anglo-French alliance. Another Henriette, Charles' sister, had married the Duc d'Orléans, Louis' brother; she left the French court in 1670 to pay a visit to Charles at Dover, and returned a few days later with the Secret Treaty of Dover in her pocket. Only Charles and James, Clifford and Arlington, were fully in the secret. Politically England was to join France in an attack on Holland; probably not a man over here, except Temple, had any objection to getting revenge on Holland with French help; Shaftesbury cried out "Delenda est Carthago," our commercial rival must be crushed. But there were also religious clauses; king and duke were to declare themselves Roman Catholics, and Louis would help them against Parliament with men and money.

Charles, the pleasure-lover, cannot have been in earnest on the religious question. He really wanted to be free from the control of Parliament, even the loyal Parliament of Cavaliers and Churchmen. Of course when the secret leaked out he offended them bitterly. Therefore this treaty marks a turning-point in our history; the very men, or the sons of the men, who had fought and died for the Crown, were turned now against the Crown; belief in Divine Right and the duty of Non-Resistance was at stake. Charles himself, seeing how fatal the step would be, drew back; but James became a Roman Catholic.

Third Dutch War and the Test Act. In 1672 began the new war. Charles repudiated his debts to find the means; an unwise step, for he set against himself the all-powerful merchant class. He issued a Declaration of Indulgence; that is, he would indulge, and by his Royal Prerogative save from the penalties of the Clarendon Code, both Roman Catholics and Nonconformists. So Bunyan was released from Bedford gaol. Yet the Nonconformists hated the idea of obtaining liberty as a royal favour, especially as they knew that the indulgence was really intended for the benefit of the Catholics. Then in 1673 the Cavalier Parliament passed the Test Act. No man might hold office under the Crown unless he were a conforming member of the Church of England, and the "test" was that he should take the Sacrament according to the rites of that Church. Charles gave the royal assent. James ceased to be Lord High Admiral; Clifford and Arlington also resigned. The new chief minister was Lord Danby.

The English and Dutch fleets fought as fiercely as ever. But De Ruyter was just able to hold Rupert off, so that no large force of English troops could be landed in Holland. The French armies of Turenne and Condé swept into the country, and seemed as though they would carry all before them. Then the Dutch nation turned against the brothers De Witt, tore them limb from limb in the streets of The Hague, and restored William III as Stadtholder; in their danger they wanted the House of Orange to lead them. He cut the dykes and saved Holland, but at a terrible cost. Certainly from this war dates the gradual decline of Holland as a Great Power.

In 1674 the temper of the English demanded peace. Our old enemy had suffered enough. Even Shaftesbury no longer wanted to see "Carthage" destroyed. Charles even went so far in 1677 as to sanction the marriage of James' daughter Mary, who was a Protestant like her mother, Anne Hyde, to William III. This match, devised by Lord Danby, bore fruit eleven years later. William III was himself half English, for his mother was Mary the elder sister of Charles. Austria came to the help of Holland, and a general peace was made in 1678.

“The Ten Thunderous Years.” Between 1678 and 1688 there was indeed peace in Western Europe, but the air was thick and heavy with the thunder of renewed war. The ambition and tyranny of Louis XIV appeared openly revealed. He increased still further both army and navy. He seized the free German city of Strasburg. He stirred up the Turks to besiege Vienna; in those days it was thought a crime for Christians to be allied with Mohammedans, and great relief was felt when John Sobieski, the gallant king of Poland, saved the city. Then came the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and thousands of Huguenots fled to Germany or Holland or England, carrying their arts and crafts with them. The same ten years were full of thunderous excitement in England, as they cover the end of Charles II's reign and the whole of James II's. Every event in England was influenced by what was happening in France. Finally the thunderous air was lightened when the storm actually burst, namely when William III sailed for England, then open war was a relief after the anxious peace. But this is looking ahead.

Three Short Parliaments and the Panic. Lord Danby was a Cavalier and Churchman, and strongly anti-Catholic. He had brought about the marriage between William and Mary, for which Louis never forgave him. By order of Charles and much against his own wishes, he arranged another treaty with Louis. In order to ruin him Louis disclosed this treaty, and the Commons proceeded to impeach him. Charles dissolved the Cavalier Parliament to save him

A very remarkable outburst of excitement against Roman Catholics, known as the Panic, was engineered by a terrible liar of the name of Titus Oates. He concocted a story that they were going to murder Charles, put James on the throne, call in the French, and begin a reign of persecution. Because of this so-called Popish Plot a number of Catholics were accused, and, among others, a peer was even executed on false evidence. Lord Shaftesbury, the Ashley of the Cabal, put himself at the head of the movement. A short-lived Parliament met. It passed the important Habeas Corpus Act, which laid down rules by which accused persons must speedily be brought to trial. But the greatest excitement was over the Exclusion Bill. Shaftesbury and his party—now nicknamed the Whigs, a name originally applied to the extreme Covenanters of Scotland,—wanted to exclude James from the throne. The Court party who supported Charles and James were in turn nicknamed the Tories, which is an Irish word. To save his brother, Charles dissolved this Parliament in 1679 and a second short-lived one in 1680.

But who could be king if James were excluded? Mary, his elder daughter, was next in order, but she was married to William of Orange, and at this date very few Englishmen wished to invite a Dutchman to be king; the memory of the Dutch wars was too recent. Shaftesbury and his Whigs pushed forward the Duke of Monmouth, the illegitimate son of Charles. Louis actually supported him, strong Protestant though he was, simply to keep out William.

A third short Parliament was called to Oxford. While all the country was blazing with excitement, Charles kept quite cool and sauntered through life as if he cared only to amuse himself as usual. He saw clearly that all sensible men would in time be disgusted by Shaftesbury's violence and Oates' lies. The Whigs came to Oxford in arms. What Charles foresaw came to pass; the middle party, headed by Lord Halifax the Trimmer, so called because like all middle men he helped to trim the ship of state, were afraid of civil war, and were entirely in Charles' favour; better a Roman Catholic heir than Monmouth at Shaftesbury's dictation. The Parliament was dissolved, and no other was called.

before Charles' death. Pleasure-lover as he was, he had saved England from civil war and was genuinely popular at this time. Louis ceased to support Shaftesbury, now that James was not to be excluded, and for the rest of the reign gave Charles money to save him from Parliament. We do not like to think of any king of ours living on French gold. Yet it was just as well that no Parliament should be called after so much excitement.

In Scotland there was actual war. The extreme Covenanters, called Cameronians after one of their preachers, were very fierce; they could not endure even bare toleration for Bishops, or for such moderate Presbyterian ministers as were willing to acknowledge Charles' government. Lauderdale and Archbishop Sharpe of St Andrews were ex-Presbyterians, and therefore considered as renegades who had been bribed over to Charles. A set of fanatics murdered Sharpe on Magus Muir. The Cameronians, badly armed but desperate, actually beat back some cavalry sent against them. But, as soon as regular royal troops were brought up, they were routed at Bothwell Brig, near Glasgow. The leader of the dragoons was John Graham of Claverhouse; to some Scots he stands as the ruthless tyrant and persecutor of godly Presbyterians, to others as the gallant royalist who met a hero's death ten years later; in English eyes he is a soldier ordered to put down rebellion, perhaps harsh, yet forced to do his duty on men guilty of, or at least sympathizing with, murder. The Cameronians suffered much, but we do not admire their intolerance towards those of other views. The whole story is graphically and sensibly treated by Scott in Old Mortality.

Royalist Reaction and Vengeance. Charles could do just what he pleased in his last four years. He sent Judge Jeffreys to examine the charters of the various towns, confiscated them, and issued new charters by which Tory town-councils could be secured. This meant that members sent to a new House of Commons would be Tories, as in many boroughs the council elected the members of Parliament, and that juries of Tories could be secured in case of political trials. Shaftesbury, afraid of being tried for treason before an unfair jury of his enemies, fled to Holland and there died. In 1683 some of the bitterest Whigs plotted to murder Charles at the Rye House when he went to Newmarket races. Algernon Sidney and Lord William Russell, two prominent Whigs, were tried on a charge of being concerned in the plot and were executed in Lincoln's Inn Fields just outside London.

Rye House

Charles succeeded in gaining his dearest wish; he died peacefully and in England. - He had aimed at power, yet had not dared to provoke the nation too far, so that he met the fate of neither his father nor his brother.

The three great writers of the reign. John Milton wrote some beautiful short pieces of poetry in the reign of Charles I, and a few sonnets during the Civil War. Under the Commonwealth he was secretary and wrote the Latin despatches of the government; also he issued pamphlets against the memory of the king, unfortunately marred by much abusive language. In his old age, blind and unhappy after the Restoration, he completed his great epic Paradise Lost, and Paradise Regained. In his last work, Samson Agonistes, he portrays himself in the person of the blind Samson, the sport of his enemies, the Philistines. He was a thorough Independent, against Presbyter and Priest alike, and in theory in favour of entire liberty of conscience. The other Puritan writer of the reign was John Bunyan.

Knole Park, Sevenoaks

Quite different was John Dryden. His master-piece is Absalom and Achitophel, a political satire and allegory; King Charles is David, Monmouth is the favourite and misguided son, Shaftesbury is Achitophel the wily and evil counsellor. In James II's reign he became a Roman Catholic.

JAMES II, 1685—1688

SEDGEMOOR, 1685.

THE TRIAL OF THE SEVEN BISHOPS, 1688.

This reign must be judged as a sequel to that of Charles. The critical fact was the Secret Treaty of Dover and the movement towards Rome; next was the answer of the Cavaliers and Churchmen, the Test Act; lastly we had the Exclusion Bill, the fear of civil war, and the reaction in favour of the Royal Family. Charles did not dare to defy Public Opinion by openly going over to Rome; James did go over, and his second wife, Mary of Modena, was a Roman Catholic, yet he was accepted as king.

He had his chance; how would he use it? If he had been content with obtaining toleration, he might have succeeded; he aimed at gaining power for Roman Catholics, and failed. He offended the very same class that Charles offended, the Cavaliers and Churchmen whose fathers had died and suffered for his father, to whom the Test Act was as dear as the Great Charter. His reputation was against him. Brave and skilful as a sailor, he had got a bad name as a persecutor in Scotland after Bothwell Brig; he was vindictive against Titus Oates, who was nearly flogged to death, and indeed deserved it; and in his first year as king he delighted in cruelty against Monmouth's followers after Sedgemoor.

But what told most against James was the aggressive policy of Louis XIV and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. James was not the ally of Louis, but at any moment he might become his ally. James did not persecute in England, but it was thought that at any moment he might begin to persecute, even as Louis did in France.

The Last Battle on English soil. James had a loyal Parliament which voted to him a yearly revenue of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ millions; he dissolved it because he wished to break the Test Act. The Earl of Argyll rose in revolt in

Sedgemoor, seven miles from Athelney ; would be under water at high-tides except for embankments and dykes

Scotland but was soon crushed. Monmouth, disappointed at losing the crown, landed at Lyme Regis in Dorset to appeal to the Protestant spirit of the nation. The country-folk and miners rallied to him, also the townsmen of Taunton and Bridgwater, strong centres of Puritanism as in the civil war, but few gentry. The campaign was feebly conducted. Churchill came up with a body of horse and hustled the insurgents, while the few regiments of the little standing army were being got ready. Then Feversham took command, but was so slack and incompetent that even Monmouth plucked up courage to try to surprise the camp on *Sedgemoor*¹. A night march of rustics, half-armed and wholly untrained, but enthusiastic, might have been successful, had not a great ditch barred their way. Behind it Churchill roused the regulars from their sleep, and at dawn routed the rebels. Monmouth was caught while hiding in a ditch, and though he cried for mercy was executed. Judge Jeffreys earned a bad name when he came down to hold the Bloody Assize, and sent to the gallows or to slavery in the colonies hundreds of rebels and sympathizers, including women and girls.

Commissions given to Roman Catholics. James was so far safe. But a new rising might occur, and foreign trained soldiers might be brought over. So it was wise to increase the standing army by some dozen new regiments; wise also, so he thought, to secure loyal officers, that is to say Roman Catholics. The Test Act stood in the way. By virtue of the Royal Prerogative he claimed the right to use his Dispensing Power, to dispense with and break the law. Few men had ever challenged the king's right to override the law in special cases. But James gave so many commissions to Catholics that the Test Act became a dead letter. A certain colonel was prosecuted before a full bench of judges; and at this date, as in Hampden's ship-money case, the king could dismiss or threaten to dismiss the judges. They decided that he had a perfect right to the service of all his subjects, even Catholics, and no Act could deprive him of such service. Armed with this decision he commissioned many more Catholics. The army, thus increased, was encamped on Hounslow Heath west of London.

¹ Sedgemoor is fen-land redeemed from the sea, and not to be confused with Dartmoor or Exmoor. The battle took place seven miles from Alfred's Athelney; see p. 20.

The attack upon the Church. To secure other privileges for Roman Catholics James issued a Declaration of Indulgence, he would indulge, or save from the penalties of the law, those who violated the Test Act and other acts. Of course he hoped to secure the good will of the Non-conformists also. But, as in his brother's reign, they hated the idea of accepting a favour intended for Roman Catholics. He only won over the Quakers. Next he wished to open to Roman Catholics the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; in particular he forced a Roman Catholic President on Magdalen College, Oxford, and turned out the Fellows, filling their places with Roman Catholics. Lastly he put on their trial the Archbishop of Canterbury and six Bishops who refused to order their clergy to read in church the Declaration. He certainly did not lose his throne by these acts alone. But he offended the whole body of Churchmen, and by so doing he made them waver in their belief in the sacredness of the Divine Right of kings. Non-resistance was all very well when Charles I was king, so they thought, but was resistance to James so wicked? Excitement was once more at boiling point when the Trial of the Seven Bishops came on, and on their acquittal London went mad with joy, and even the soldiers on Hounslow Heath cheered loudly.

The Invitation sent to William. People might have endured all this, and even more, if a son had not been born to James and Mary of Modena. Here was the last straw, for of course the child would be brought up in his father's faith. There was but one person to whom to appeal. William III of Orange, husband of James' Protestant daughter Mary, was already arming and collecting allies against the French. Jealousy between England and Holland was forgotten, and an invitation was sent across to him. But the naval and military preparations were by no means easy. If a few men rose against James, they would meet the fate of Monmouth; if William sent or came himself with a big organized army, and if blood were once shed, that old jealousy might break out again. Louis might try to meet the invading fleet at sea and stop it; or he might invade Holland while William was in the act of invading England. But James refused aid from Louis, probably wisely, so that he might show that he trusted to English loyalty alone against the Dutchman. Louis had, as despots often have, too many irons in the fire; in 1688 he sent a great force to invade Rhineland, and William was free to sail to England.

The "Glorious" Bloodless Revolution. In the days of sailing ships an invasion of England from France was difficult, for any wind that helped the attack would also help the defence. But from Holland, lying opposite the angle of Kent, an enemy could sail to our east or south coast whatever wind might be blowing. In this case the "Protestant" wind carried William to Devonshire while it blew James' defending fleet back into the Thames. William landed at Brixham in Tor Bay on November 5. His army was not entirely composed of Dutch, hereditary enemies of England; he had also the English and Scottish mercenaries in the Dutch service, French Huguenots, Germans, and Danes. James' army reached Salisbury. Then some officers came over to William, amongst them John Churchill, and Anne and her husband, George of Denmark. The loyalists were without a leader and fell back without plans. James fled, was caught and brought back, but luckily fled again and escaped to France. If civil war was to be avoided, it was just as well that he should go at once. It would have been a national misfortune if he had remained to pose as a martyr, imprisoned as was his great-grandmother by Elizabeth, or his father by Cromwell and the Army. He had had his chance and had misused it; he had shown his character in his revengeful treatment of Monmouth's followers, and he had violated the Test Act so far that law was dead; but he departed in time to save England from the horrors of civil war.

The Crown awarded by Parliament. A *Convention*¹ Parliament met in January 1689. James had abdicated by exiling himself, and had taken his baby son with him. A Declaration of Rights was drawn up, not a law, but a general statement of the conditions on which the crown should be awarded; the Dispensing Power, "as used of late," was declared to be illegal, so too was the maintenance of a Standing Army without consent of Parliament; Parliaments must be held frequently. Accepting the clauses of the Declaration, William and Mary were made king and queen jointly. Had Mary alone been nominated, the decision of Parliament would not have been so marked. But William, not being in the direct line, was nevertheless put on an equality with her. So we have here the final unchallenged right of Parliament to award the crown as its gift. Yet Burke says very truly that only a slight deviation was made on this great occasion. After all, the important power is not Parliament itself, but Public Opinion. We shall see in the following reigns that often Parliament does not represent Public Opinion, but in 1689 it did. Of course the strict doctrine of the Divine Right and of the duty of Non-Resistance to kings was finally killed.

Let us sum up: James, in his anxiety to break down a bad law, practically broke all law; so he lost his throne.

¹ A Convention is a Parliament called to meet without royal summons

WILLIAM III AND MARY,

1689—1694—1702

LONDONDERRY, 1689. KILLIECRANKIE, 1689.

THE BOYNE, 1690. MASSACRE OF GLENCOE, 1692.

BATTLE OF CAPE LA HOGUE, 1692.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND FOUNDED, 1694.

CAPTURE OF NAMUR, 1695. TREATY OF RYSWICK, 1697.

William's whole life was passed in the midst of anxiety and alarms. As a boy he had been excluded from the Stadtholdership by the Dutch Republicans; in 1672 he was called to take that office when the French invasion burst upon Holland, the De Witts were murdered, and he saved his country by cutting the dykes. Ever after he was the steady enemy of France. He was a cold, reserved man, so deeply engaged in the absorbing study of politics that he had no time for the softnesses of life. The murder of the De Witts, his treatment of the Irish, and the massacre of Glencoe, set people against him, though he was guilty of acquiescing in and profiting by what others did rather than of originating evil things himself. Yet he was not the selfish calculating Dutchman that some writers make him out to have been. In particular, the accusation that he cared nothing for England, and that he dragged England into war simply for the sake of his beloved Holland, is unfair, for our country gained enormously by the war. Certainly he was not popular. Nor was he quite the perfect and noble character that Lord Macaulay painted. On the other hand Mary was popular and thoroughly English; her death in 1694 was a blow which he felt keenly, though he had not been kind or affectionate to her.

What this reign did for England. The coming of William to be our king meant, first of all, the Supremacy of Parliament. Of course the Prerogative was not abolished; William managed all his foreign affairs himself; he could veto any law, and did veto several. The Declaration of Rights only condemned the Dispensing Power "as used of late," that is, as James II had recklessly used it. But Parliamentary control over the king's ministers was won before the end of the reign. Two things led to annual sessions, though the Declaration said "frequently," not "yearly." First, the Mutiny Bill was passed annually, and held good for one year only; the king was thus forced to call Parliament every year if he wished to have control over the army. Secondly, the Commons arranged for an annual budget; when ministers had money to last for but one year, they had to meet the Commons every year.

William at first chose his ministers from the Whigs and the Tories as he liked. But soon he saw that they were so totally opposed to each other in their views that he had to choose from one Party only, namely, that Party which had most votes in the Commons: here are the first seeds of our modern system of Party Government. The Whigs held that Parliament was superior to the Crown; they favoured toleration for Nonconformists; they had the support of the commercial and banking classes and were therefore particularly strong in the cities; and they supported the war against France, both to keep out the Stuarts and for the supposed benefit of England's growing trade. The Tories still professed to believe that the Crown should be stronger than Parliament; were strong Churchmen as against both Roman Catholics and Nonconformists; were the party of the landed country gentry and farmers as opposed to the merchants and bankers; and, whether secretly or openly, disliked the French war. Of course not every Whig or Tory held all these views. Danby was a keen Churchman and Tory, yet in favour of the war; Godolphin was a clever financier, yet a Tory. Though the vast majority of land-owners were Tories, some of the richest landowners, such as the Dukes of Bedford and Devonshire, were Whigs; their position in the House of Lords, and the great influence which their wealth gave them over the Commons, led them to uphold the superiority of Parliament.

Toleration in religion was now definitely settled by the Toleration Act. This only means that worship was at last free, and the Conventicle Act was cancelled. The Test and the Corporations Acts were still in force. Many Nonconformists, in order to get over the difficulty, conformed occasionally, that is, took the Sacrament in church a few times a year, and then went back to their chapels, having thus qualified to hold office. Roman Catholics were still excluded from holding any office.

But, above all, the coming of William to England meant open war with France. Between 1688 and 1815 we fought seven long wars, and during four of them Holland was our steady ally. The prize, though hardly any one could see it then, was the British Empire. In six of these wars we had many allies and exhausted France in the long run; she found it difficult to keep up both fleet and army; we gave most attention to our fleet, and yet by adding our small army to the armies of our allies distracted her attention to the land from the sea. This is what Lord Roberts meant when he recently said that our army has won our Sea Power for us. Louis XIV and Napoleon suffered alike by being unable to spare men or money for the sea. In the War of American Independence alone France had the allies, and Great Britain was isolated and lost control of the sea.

The Jacobite¹ cause in Scotland. The perfectly distinct and independent Parliament in Scotland declared James to be deposed, and elected William and Mary. The Presbyterian Church was finally restored, and Episcopalians were kept down, not to say persecuted. The great majority of Scots were for William. But the loyal servant of James, John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, raised some of the Highland clans. He had the gift of leadership, of awaking enthusiasm, just like his kinsman, Montrose. Scott's stirring poem is well known:

"The Gordon demands of him which way he goes;
'Where'er shall direct me the shade of Montrose'"

He defeated with one rush of claymores an army of lowland Scots under General Mackay at Killiecrankie in north Perthshire. But he himself died in the moment of victory. We are forced to admire Claverhouse and other Jacobites, who bled or went into exile, losing all for the Stuart cause; unselfish devotion to an idea, loyalty without thought of reward, is too rare to be sneered at. Aytoun's Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers do them justice in simple beautiful verse.

Mackay rallied his troops; Claverhouse's successor could not hold the Highlanders together. The country was reduced to peace, and Fort William lying beneath Ben Nevis is a memorial of this reign. In general there was little cruelty or revenge. But the case of the MacDonalds of Glencoe was exceptional. Their chief delayed to take the oath of allegiance to William till too late, the last day being December 31, 1691. The Master of Stair, meaning to make an example, got an order from William for the extirpation of the clan. Some soldiers of the Campbell clan were quartered on Glencoe,* and treated with hospitality, then suddenly slaughtered many of the MacDonalds. William's share in the guilt of the Massacre of Glencoe is confined to his neglect to punish adequately Stair and his men when the truth of the story came out.

¹ Jacobites are followers of James.

The Jacobite cause in Ireland. It was a much more difficult task to pacify Ireland. The Roman Catholics rose everywhere and turned off the land the Protestant settlers, whether the descendants of James I's colonists in Ulster or the Cromwellians of the centre and south. It was a national Irish movement against English supremacy. James came over from France in the hope of re-conquering England from Ireland; Louis gave him some French troops, but not nearly enough, nor did he send a fleet to intercept reinforcements from England. The Protestants retreated to Londonderry on the river Foyle, and to Enniskillen between upper and lower Lough Erne. The Irish in 1689 closely besieged Londonderry, and constructed a boom across the Foyle to cut off any relief from the sea. The defenders held out heroically, being inspired by the words and example of George Walker, a clergyman. Then a relieving fleet arrived from England, and after some delay three ships under the command of Captain Leake charged and broke the boom. Londonderry was saved when at the last gasp of starvation. A force from the fleet also moved on Enniskillen and helped its defenders to win the battle of Newtown Butler.

In 1690 William came over in person to take command of the mixed army of Dutch, English, Protestant Irish, Huguenots, and Germans. Moving from Ulster southwards he forced the passage of the Boyne, where the Irish broke and fled, while their few French allies covered their retreat. No man can ever accuse Irishmen of cowardice; they broke at the Boyne because they mistrusted James. Indeed he cared only for Ireland as a base for the re-conquest of England, while they were fighting for national independence from England. James at once returned to France. William occupied Dublin.

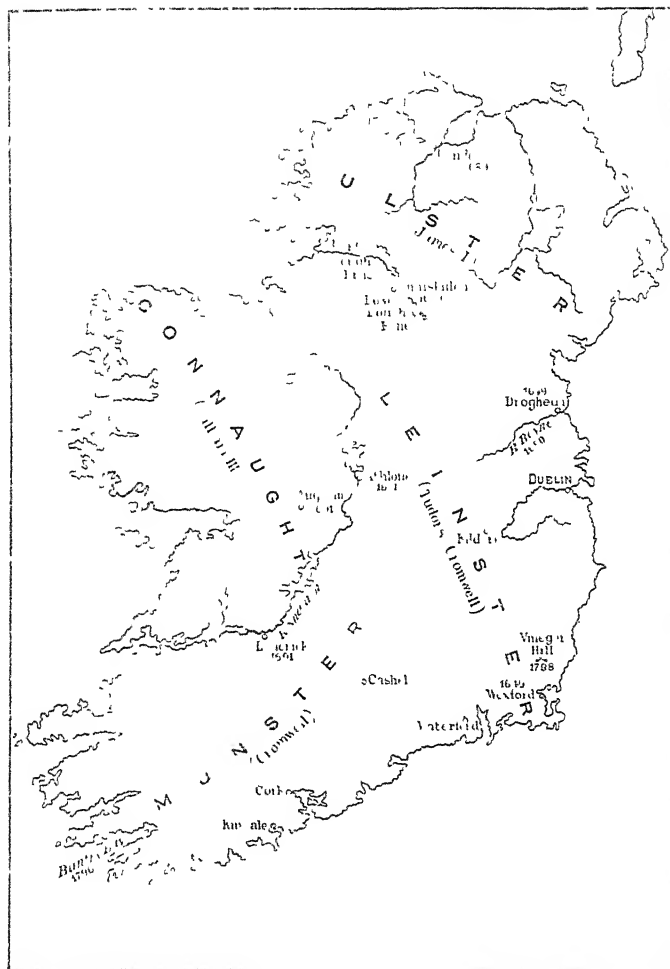

We are surprised that Louis did not pour troops into Ireland and send his fleet to dispute the mastery of St George's Channel against William. The French navy was still young and inexperienced, yet large and ambitious. But Louis only used it this year to fight off Beachy Head, where it gained a victory over the English and Dutch ships owing to a misunderstanding between the admirals; Herbert, the English admiral, was in consequence unfairly accused of being a Jacobite and a traitor. A few French troops were landed on the coast of Devon and did some damage, but an outburst of patriotic enthusiasm proved that the English nation was very strongly anti-Jacobite and anti-French.

The year closed with the capture of Cork and Kinsale, two valuable ports, by Churchill, newly created Earl of Marlborough. But William's attempt on Limerick failed. Sarsfield, who has been rightly called the Irish Claverhouse, held out bravely and animated his countrymen, even after James had deserted them.

In 1691 a Dutch general crossed the Shannon at Athlone, beat the French and Irish at Aughrim, and closed in on Limerick. This ended the Irish war. Limerick surrendered on condition that religious and political liberty should be enjoyed by Roman Catholics as under Charles II. But the Parliament at Dublin was now entirely composed of Protestants, and they determined to assert their ascendancy. The terms of the surrender were violated. The Penal Code of very severe laws was built up against Catholics: they might not sit in Parliament or vote at Parliamentary elections, or practise law or medicine, or hold commissions in army or navy, or any government post; an heir who turned Protestant might seize his father's estate; lands were restored to the Protestant settlers, and more were confiscated across the Shannon, a district which had been left untouched by Cromwell. The memory of this treatment, added to the memory of the Cromwellian rule, is at the root of the feeling against England which remains to-day. For many years to come Irish soldiers in the French army charged to the cry of "Remember Limerick."

This war caused much bitter feeling between the English and the Dutch officers. Marlborough in particular was offended and was the mouth-piece of discontent. He was stirring Anne against her sister Mary, and so William was forced to dismiss him from his service.

Ireland: Stuarts and George III

War against the French by sea. In 1690 the French fleet had been victorious and there had been a French landing in Devon. In 1692 an attempt was made to invade with a large army from Normandy, for Louis thought that the Jacobite feeling was growing in England. Admiral Russell foiled it by his victory at Cape La Hogue. He was not a Nelson, yet his victory was nearly as important as Trafalgar. He followed up by an attack in boats, and burnt fifteen ships as they lay near shore under the eyes of the French army. Louis was disgusted. His great minister Colbert was now dead, and he seems to have decided that, if after Colbert's death his navy was so badly beaten, he had better not waste any more money on it, but turn all his attention to the war by land. Indeed France could not maintain both fleet and army. French privateers did very much harm to our commerce, and once a large convoy of our merchantmen was destroyed on its way to the Mediterranean. But a naval historian¹ puts it thus: if English commerce be doubled by a successful war at sea, England can afford to lose a percentage to privateers; plundering raids can never take the place of organized fighting by main fleets. The same thing is true of the Napoleonic wars, even after Trafalgar. Even a nation victorious at sea must put up with the loss of some commerce. At any rate William after La Hogue was able to land his troops at will in Flanders. In 1694 Russell sailed triumphantly into the Mediterranean.

War against the French by land. Louis all his life coveted the Spanish Netherlands. Probably he neglected to help Claverhouse, and sent not nearly enough help to Ireland, because he thought that he had a fine chance to conquer Flanders while William was busy in reducing the Scots and Irish. Not only England and Holland, but also Spain, Austria, Bavaria, Brandenburg, and most of the German states, were allied against him. He captured Mons and Namur and other border fortresses. But after the surrender of Limerick William was able to devote all his attention to Flanders. He was beaten twice by the Duke of Luxemburg, Turenne's ablest pupil. Macaulay draws a fine picture of the hump-backed dwarf leading the French to the attack and the asthmatic skeleton coolly covering the retreat of the English and allies. William had considerable power in rallying his troops after a defeat. As King of England and Stadtholder of Holland, and trusted by his German allies, he was in a position of great power. At last in 1695 he laid siege to Namur, lying at the fork of the Meuse and Sambre rivers, and strongly fortified by all the art of the engineer Vauban. He stormed and captured it, —the first success of the allies over Louis' dreaded troops¹.

¹ Admiral Mahan of the U.S. Navy.

National finance and the war. "The last piece of gold will win," said Louis. Therefore the question was—could he, or could Holland and England combined, last out the longer? The chances were in favour of the two commercial and naval powers. From this reign we date the origin of the National Debt. In days gone by an Edward III or a Henry V had borrowed money for a war on his own personal responsibility, pledging it might be his jewels, and expecting to repay after the next Parliamentary grant; William III's ministers borrowed on the faith of the nation. The idea was that since war benefits future generations, they should pay their share in interest on the war loans. Then the Bank of England was founded. Leading merchants in London raised money to lend to government; Parliament guaranteed to them interest at 8 per cent., and created them as a body to carry on business as dealers in money. In William's reign the national finance was sound. The bankers and those who lent any money to government were Whigs and keenly supported William against James, for the plain reason that a restored Stuart would probably repudiate the debts; they were in favour of war because they got high interest on their loans, whereas the Tories grumbled because they had to pay that interest out of the Land Tax. Therefore it was during the war that William found it necessary to choose all his ministers from the Whig party.

¹ Map, p. 347

It was now that a new coinage had to be issued to stop the old practice of cutting thin shavings of gold or silver off the coins. The goldsmiths, who were the private bankers of the time, hated the new Bank of England. They bought up all the bank notes that they could get, and presented them to the Bank for immediate payment in gold. This would have meant ruin; there were not coins enough in circulation, for the new money was being made slowly. Parliament interfered and authorized the Bank to refuse for a time to pay in gold. New mints were set up under the direction of the great Sir Isaac Newton, and at last the new coins were plentiful, so that gold payments could be resumed. So the danger passed away.

Peace and Restoration of Conquests. A treaty was concluded at Ryswick in Holland in 1697. Louis agreed to restore the places conquered from Spain since 1678, thus himself retaining French Flanders and Artois and Franche Comté; also as Austria would not agree at once, he retained Strassburg, the great fortress and free German city of Alsace. He acknowledged William as king, thereby promising to cease to help James. But a new war was sure to come. Louis merely wanted a breathing-space; he would renew his aggressions whenever he had the opportunity.

England and William during Peace. Parliament during the war passed a Triennial Act. The Mutiny Bill made it necessary for Parliament to meet every year; by the Triennial Act it was decided that there must be a new election at least at the end of every third year. In 1697 there was an election. Owing to William's popularity at the time, because of the fall of Namur and the Peace, the Whigs were in a majority. Yet so great was the national dislike of a standing army that the Tories and some of the Whigs combined to cut down its numbers. Time after time we shall find the same thing happening; fear of a new Cromwell who might become a military despot, and fear of a great National Debt, lead to reductions in the army; then when a new war breaks out the soldiers are ignorantly blamed for not winning victories at once. In this case it was a very dangerous policy, for Louis was still formidable and ambitious. Gradually the old jealousy against William revived; the army was cut down to 7000 men and his Dutch guards were dismissed.

The Jacobite Conspiracies: Marlborough. It is very difficult to trace in this reign the truth of the stories about Jacobite plots. There were plenty of genuine Jacobites who wanted to see James back again, not only Roman Catholics, but also High Church Tories who still believed in the Divine Right, and were called Non-Jurors because they refused to take an oath of allegiance to William. Some of them even plotted to murder William, and an Association was formed to protect him, as a century ago to protect Elizabeth. But the difficulty is when we are asked to believe that William's ministers and friends, some of the very men to whom he owed his throne, corresponded with James; for instance Danby, the old minister of Charles II, who had been a strong opponent of James, Godolphin the financier, Russell the victor at Cape La Hogue, and above all Marlborough. Mere gossip explains much; a few chance words of anger against William and his Dutch favourites, when repeated from mouth to mouth, would soon be exaggerated into words of downright treason. An offer of help to James might be mere lip-service, a sort of "hedging" in case he really were restored. Jacobite spies were notoriously untruthful; even Lord Macaulay hesitates to believe them except when their evidence tells against Marlborough.

Here we have the question narrowed down. Macaulay's famous History of England, really a history of the reigns of James II and William III, has as its central hero William himself. Marlborough's glory in Anne's reign seems to eclipse William's, so Macaulay believes every libel that tells against Marlborough, even if anonymous; he suppresses evidence which would tell against others more strongly than against Marlborough. Take the story of the information said to have been given by Marlborough to James, and passed on to Louis, that an English fleet and army were going to attack Brest in 1694. The Jacobite spies implicated many others besides Marlborough; the letter that Marlborough is said to have written does not exist, and the French "translation" may have been forged; in any case the date is later than the date when Louis had already given Vauban orders to fortify Brest. But Macaulay writes as if Marlborough, and he alone, had given the information in a letter still extant. In fact in reading his account we cannot avoid being prejudiced in Marlborough's favour.

Attempt to Found a Scottish Colony. The Navigation Act was still in force, by which all English colonial trade had to be carried on in English ships. Commerce continually grew, and the Whig merchants were prosperous. The only addition to our colonial empire was Calcutta; Fort William was erected to protect it. Scotland and Ireland, having separate Parliaments, were counted as foreign countries and could not trade with English colonies. So a body of Scottish merchants tried to found a colony of their own. But they managed badly. They chose a site at Darien on the Isthmus of Panama; the climate was vile, and the land belonged to Spain, which country above all others William wished not to offend; the English merchants in Jamaica were jealous. Failure was the inevitable result. The Scottish nation lost a great deal of money, and unfairly accused William and the English of deliberately ruining their colony. William saw that the only sensible thing to do was to unite the Parliaments of England and Scotland so that they might form one nation for trade and government. This policy he bequeathed to Anne, in whose reign his favourite Whig minister Lord Somers and his warm supporter Daniel Defoe brought about the Union.

Unluckily he bequeathed to Anne a bad policy of repressing Ireland by strong penal laws against Catholics.

Who shall be the new King of Spain? The "sick man of Europe" had for some years past been the once dreaded and warlike Spain, and Louis had been her constant enemy. Louis had married Maria Theresa, sister of King Charles II of Spain, but had renounced for his descendants any claim that they might have through her to the Spanish throne. Now Charles was dying and was childless. Louis wanted to secure the throne, not for himself, nor for the Dauphin, nor for the Dauphin's eldest son, but for the second son Philip of Anjou. But the powers of Europe were afraid to allow a Frenchman to hold Spain, and still more to hold the Spanish Netherlands; the "sick man" was wealthy, and might revive with French help; Philip, if allowed to rule, would be under his grandfather's control. Thus, though it strikes us as strange that foreigners should dictate to the proud Spaniards, they—and especially William and the Dutch—felt justified in interfering. They forced Louis to agree to a Partition Treaty, by which a Bavarian prince, grandson of another sister of Charles, was to succeed to Spain and the bulk of the Spanish Empire. But he shortly died. So by a second Partition Treaty they chose the Archduke Charles of Austria, second son of the Emperor, a grandson of an aunt of Charles of Spain. Obviously Philip had a better claim than the Archduke, as sister is a closer relation than aunt¹.

¹ See p. 301.

But the allies had left out of consideration the proud temper of the Spaniards themselves, at least of the Castilians. Charles II of Spain at last died, and bequeathed his crown to Philip; the nation accepted Philip, partly because the allies wanted to force the Archduke Charles on them, partly because they were unwilling to see their great empire split up. Louis sent French troops to support him, and occupied in his name the fortresses of the Netherlands and Italy.

The English nation was cool at first and opposed to the idea of war. The Tories were in power in 1700, and William had had to dismiss his Whig ministers. Even Tories did not like to see French garrisons in the Netherlands. Yet they did not sanction war till Louis made a bad blunder. The exiled James II died, and Louis acknowledged his young son—we know him as the Old Pretender, because it was said that he was not really James' son,—as James III of England. Then the war spirit surged up in England. William dissolved Parliament, and at the new election of 1701 a majority of Tories, but anti-French Tories, was returned.

The Electress Sophia of Hanover. The last act of the reign was the Act of Settlement. Of course William's successor would be Anne. But all her children had died, and who was the next heir? By the Act the main Stuart line was barred out for ever. After Anne, was chosen Sophia, wife of the Elector of Hanover, daughter of Elizabeth of the Palatinate, and granddaughter of James I. In any case she was Protestant heiress, as her brothers Rupert and Maurice had died childless, but she was named by the act definitely and beyond doubt.

We do not expect such an act from a Tory Parliament. But that party made a virtue of necessity. Also they added clauses that would control the action of any future German king; for instance, no king might dismiss any judge at his own pleasure, and thus was destroyed one of the most valued powers of the Stuarts¹. English law-courts have ever since been absolutely free from royal interference.

William's health was frail and he suffered from asthma. In 1702 he died from the shock of a fall from his horse in Hampton Court Park. The Jacobites drank to the health of "the little gentleman in black velvet," namely the mole which threw up the mole-hill over which the horse stumbled.

¹ See p 260 Hampden's case , and p 319 Colonel Hâles' case

ANNE, 1702—1714

BLLENHEIM AND GIBRALTAR, 1704. RANILIES, 1706.

ALMANZA, 1707.

OUDEKARDE, 1708. MALPLAQUET, 1709.

THE TORIES COME TO POWER, 1710.

TREATY OF UTRECHT, 1713.

THE UNION WITH SCOTLAND, 1707.

She is always known as Good Queen Anne, for one hardly knows what else to call her. She was not clever. Like all the Stuarts she could be obstinate and a strong hater; and she was strongly attached to the Church. At the crisis of her reign in 1710 the fate of the country seemed to turn upon her whim of the moment—whether she would be influenced by her old and patriotic, but overbearing, favourite, Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, or by the new favourite whom the Tories pushed forward, Mrs Abigail Masham née Hill. Her husband, Prince George of Denmark, was a nobody.

John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough. Let us look back at this great man's early career. He owed everything at first to James when he was Duke of York; scandal loves to dwell on the stories of his early life, but scandal is ever a bit pharisaical. He fought and learnt his first lessons in war under Marshal Turenne in 1672. He was the best soldier at Sedgemoor, but was disgusted by James' cruelty after that battle. His desertion of his patron James can only be justified by assuming that he had a really conscientious wish to secure a Protestant king for England, and most people turn against him because he is supposed to have afterwards betrayed William's plans to James. But it is clear that William deprived him of all his offices for a different reason, namely because he was the mouth-piece of the discontented English officers who objected to having Dutchmen set over their heads. The story of the Brest treachery is difficult to unravel, but when we see how unfairly Macaulay twisted every bit of evidence and gossip that seems to tell against him we are rather prejudiced in his favour. At least William on one occasion scornfully refused to listen to a tale of Marlborough's treachery, saying that he could not believe it of his friends, and on his deathbed recommended him to Anne. It was lucky for England that she made him Captain-General and trusted him for at least eight years.

John Churchill, Lord Duke of Marlborough

He is represented as being selfish and miserly. But no man ever had more bitter enemies, and he has been badly treated in literature, for besides Macaulay there are Swift and Thackeray against him. Of course Thackeray for the purpose of his novel Henry Esmond paints him simply as his enemies knew him. Jonathan Swift was his contemporary, and in 1710 attacked him with all his cleverness and venom for a political reason: in order to bring about peace, the successful general must be denounced as a monster. He was unpopular at that date because the nation wanted peace, and, because of this unpopularity, all his actions were misrepresented and mere gossip passed for truth. His widow passionately defended his memory against the charge of miserliness; was she more likely to be telling lies than Swift? Here is one fact on the other side: he gave up all his Blenheim bounty money to the soldiers of his army.

He was not only great as a soldier, he also controlled the government and the national policy, in part directly, in part through his devoted friend Godolphin who was Lord Treasurer. Only under Cromwell, under Marlborough, and under the elder Pitt, has the nation waged an entirely successful war, one reason for their success being that there was no ignorant civilian ministry to thwart them. His organization was thorough. He alone could persuade the sluggish Dutch and Germans to greater energy; he alone could dissuade Charles XII of Sweden from helping France. If ever the war went badly in one direction, it was because he was not there on the spot, and the allies did not work well together except under his own eye. He co-operated wonderfully with Prince Eugene without a trace of jealousy. He was cool and far-sighted, calm in battle, "a brain packed in ice"¹; Eugene was hot and enthusiastic, and raged with the fury of battle.

We can trace a development in the art of war through Gustavus Adolphus, Cromwell, and Turenne; Marlborough, if a slang phrase be allowed, went just one better. He profited by military reforms that others had begun. All his foot were armed with the new flint-locks and socket-bayonets, and by ceaseless drill he made them fire very rapidly with their bayonets fixed. His cavalry he trained to charge with the naked steel, wave after wave, till the enemy were broken by his last reserve. Sieges were to him quite secondary. He anticipated Napoleon by the quickness of his marches, planning his campaigns on a wide scale which his allies could hardly understand. Having beaten the armies he would snap up the fortresses as the prize of victory.

Eugene merits a word. He came from the ducal house of Savoy, but was brought up in France. The domineering Louis XIV insisted that he should be a priest. He fled to Austria and entered the Emperor's service. Try to imagine the French king's feelings when he heard afterwards of Eugene's victories. Later on he contributed more than any other general to break the military power of the Turks.

Allies and Resources on each side. Against William III Louis had fought alone. Now he had all the resources of Spain on his side, the invaluable fortresses of the Netherlands and North Italy. He did what Napoleon did with conspicuous success just a century later; he profited by the lack of union in Germany, and he made Bavaria his ally, and so got a direct line of attack upon Austria. Sweden might perhaps join him, and the Hungarians were often in revolt against Austria. His will was law to all the French armies. As France lay in the middle between the allies, he could reinforce one army from another as he liked, being on the inner lines.

¹ Said by the late Mr G. W. Steevens of Sir Hector Macdonald.

The allies were England, Holland, Denmark, Austria, Brandenburg, whose Elector had been newly raised to be King of Prussia, Hanover, Baden, and other German states. Their weakness was their lack of unity, which at times thwarted even Marlborough. Two small states were more important than one would think; Savoy gave to the allies the valuable Alpine passes; Portugal gave to their fleets the harbour of Lisbon as a base. To secure Portugal, the old ally of Cromwell and Charles II, Methuen made a treaty by which port wine paid less duty on entering England; unluckily when strong port was cheap, and men drank it in place of light French claret, the national curse of intemperance was aggravated.

The War of the Spanish Succession saw little done in 1702 and 1703. Marlborough was creating his army, and only captured Bonn and Liège as bases from which to attack the Spanish Netherlands from the east. Villars, the ablest marshal of France, designed an attack upon Vienna through Bavaria, but he quarrelled with the Elector and was recalled. A naval expedition under Rooke failed to capture Cadiz, but destroyed some treasure-ships in Vigo harbour. Marlborough disliked such a policy of mere raids by sea.

At home the first ministry was composed of Tories. Those among them who were lukewarm on the question of war were by degrees weeded out.

Campaign and battle in Bavaria. In 1704 the great design of Villars was entrusted to another marshal, Marsin, who joined the Elector of Bavaria; Tallard supported him on the Rhine; Vendome was to come up from Italy; meanwhile Villeroi faced Marlborough in the Netherlands. Then Marlborough rose to the occasion. He saw that he could safely disregard Villeroi, and launched his British troops on a cross-march from the Netherlands, up the Rhine and the Neckar, to the upper Danube. He joined Eugene and the allied Germans, and headed off Marsin and Tallard and the Bavarians at Blenheim in Bavaria. Here with his cavalry he broke the French centre and cut off their right wing against the Danube; Tallard and 11,000 prisoners were taken. Of the 55,000 allies in the actual battle only 9000 were British, but the brunt of the fighting fell on them, and both the battle and the daring march which led

Bavaria and the Black Forest

- Marlborough's march in 1704
 ————— Napoleon's march in 1805

to it were due to the Englishman. Bavaria was crushed and useless to Louis as an ally; Austria was saved; French prestige was broken, and the French armies were put on the defensive; such were the results of Blenheim. One hundred and one years later the storm of war once more burst into Bavaria. But in 1805 there was no Marlborough to help the Austrians, and Napoleon's great campaign of Ulm and Austerlitz was the Blenheim campaign reversed.

By this instance we see how Marlborough regarded the theatre of the war as a whole, just like a chess-board; the Dutch kept their eyes only on a few squares, and did not wish him to leave their neighbourhood. But a petty war of sieges was not to his taste. The same year he designed another campaign in Spain to distract Louis. Rooke's capture of Gibraltar was the result. A battle was fought against the French fleet off Malaga and was drawn; yet, as they retreated into Toulon harbour, it was as good as a victory. *

The Allies gain ground in Spain. In 1705 and 1706 Marlborough had his eyes on the Mediterranean. Since the French fleet had retreated from Malaga, the Sea Power was on the side of the allies, and their troops could be landed anywhere. He was not satisfied with Portugal or Gibraltar as a base of attack; on the other side, Catalonia, with Barcelona as its capital, lay like a wedge between the rest of Spain and France, and the Catalans were always enemies of Castile and Madrid. He entrusted the campaign to Lord Peterborough. In 1705 the Anglo-Dutch fleet carried round a force which seized Barcelona, and the Archduke Charles was saluted as Charles III of Spain. In 1706 a French army and fleet besieged the city to re-take it; Sir John Leake, whom we last mentioned at the relief of Londonderry, came sailing up; the French retreated without fighting, and never struck another blow to dispute the command of the sea. Other places on the coast fell to the allies. An Anglo-Portuguese army advanced from Lisbon under Lord Galway, and seized Madrid. But you never know when Spaniards are beaten. The Castilians rose as one man, and Galway had to evacuate Madrid¹.

There is some doubt as to whether Peterborough was a charlatan or a genius. Even if he was a brilliant leader of surprises and irregular warfare, he was of a queer temper and could not get on well with his allies. He has been praised by Macaulay, chiefly because his fame was considered to rival Marlborough's. Galway was a Huguenot refugee and an old friend of William III.

¹ Map on p. 431

Campaign in the Netherlands. Meanwhile Marlborough had to face a line of fortifications in the Netherlands. At last in 1706, he caught the French, under the incapable Villeroy, at Ramilies, a few miles east of Waterloo. He won his second crushing victory, almost solely with the troops of the allies, and used the English to follow up and seize the prize of victory. Brussels and Antwerp were taken at once; Ostend fell after a siege. All Flanders and Brabant were won, and the French were driven back to the border fortresses. The Dutch governed the conquered districts and made themselves very unpopular. With Antwerp and Ostend in his hands Marlborough was now nearer to England, and could get his supplies and recruits much more quickly.

Eugene was equally successful in North Italy. He drove the French along the Po, beat them at Turin, and could threaten France.

Could peace have been made at this moment after the triumphs at Barcelona, Ramilies, and Turin? Negotiations were begun and broke down; nor is it surprising, for so great a king as Louis could not take defeats tamely. France was capable of more effort. Indeed peace now would only have meant another short breathing-space.

The Allies are worsted in Spain. Not only did the French make a great effort in 1707; they gained victories. Marlborough had got his wedge, Catalonia, between France and Spain, and wanted now to attack south France and to leave Madrid alone. The capture of Toulon would ruin the French power in the Mediterranean; and Toulon could be attacked by Eugene from Italy, and by a mixed force of allies from Barcelona under the escort of the fleet. But the Archduke Charles could not understand; the Emperor had other plans; Peterborough had to be recalled. Lord Galway advanced once more on Madrid with some English

The Netherlands: to illustrate reigns of Elizabeth, William III, and Anne and Portuguese; at Almanza, 180 miles south-east of Madrid, he met the French and Spaniards under the Duke of Berwick, and was badly beaten; notice that the English were commanded by a Frenchman who was a Huguenot exile, and the French by an Englishman who was a Jacobite exile. Eugene by himself was repulsed from Toulon.

Next year the fleet under Leake with an army under Stanhope occupied Minorca, but too late for Marlborough's main design. But though the allies were thus foiled in Spain, and only Catalonia and Minorca were the fruits of much effort, the policy of weakening France from the south was good. The foundations of our Sea Power in the Mediterranean were laid. Marlborough's conception of a fleet as the base of a land attack upon an enemy's weak spot was admirable.

Meanwhile he was drawing closer to the Whig party. Old Whig ministers, such as Somers, the friend of William III, were being brought into the ministry. After Blenheim the Tory Parliament had voted to Marlborough the royal manor of Woodstock in Oxfordshire, and the ugly mansion, Blenheim Palace, was being built. But the Tories were cooling in their liking for war.

The Union of England and Scotland. Godolphin and Somers were able at last to carry out William's policy, and they were ably supported by the pen of Defoe. The Scots hated the idea of an amalgamation of Parliaments, thinking that it foreshadowed the loss of national independence. The question was really urgent. If Anne should die, would Scotland accept a king from Hanover? If a king were chosen who was not the choice of England also, would the old Franco-Scottish alliance be revived? But there was no other candidate possible. The great Presbyterian majority of the nation were against the Roman Catholic Stuarts. The Duke of Hamilton, though he had Bruce's blood in him, was a man of no character. The Scots found themselves forced to accept the Union. They were to have the same king; to send sixteen peers, elected by the Scotch peerage, to the Lords, and forty-five members to the Commons; but to retain their own Presbyterian Church, and their own Law Courts. It followed as a matter of course that all Scots could under the Navigation Act trade with English colonies and with England. They lost a Parliament of their own and gained a world-wide commerce. The first Union Jack was now designed, the white cross of St Andrew on a blue ground being joined to the red cross of St George on a white ground.

Campaign for the Border Fortresses. In 1708 the allies concentrated their attention upon the Netherlands, and Eugene was on his way to join Marlborough. But the French began the campaign. The Duke of Vendome took advantage of the hatred of the Flemings against the Dutch to burst into Flanders along the river Schelde; they welcomed him, and opened the gates of Ghent and Bruges, but Antwerp was too strongly garrisoned. Then he feigned to attack Brussels and drew Marlborough thither, but dashed aside to seize Oudenarde on the Schelde. By one of his very rapid marches Marlborough just reached Oudenarde in time; Eugene, leaving his army behind, rode up in time to fight and was put in command of the English on the right wing. Vendome was for attacking the allies as they came up and hoped to beat them piecemeal. But the Duke of Burgundy, Louis' grandson, interfered and drew the French off. Then, in the afternoon, when the allies were in position, Burgundy repented and attacked, was surrounded, and decisively beaten.

After the victory Eugene's army joined Marlborough's. The Duke was for an invasion right into France, the Prince was afraid to run the risk. So they laid siege to the great French fortress of Lille. The Duke covered the siege against Vendome's efforts to relieve, and the Prince mined and assaulted. On one occasion a large convoy was being brought up from Ostend, and a French force tried to intercept it at Wynendael, but was beaten off by General Webb with half their numbers. Marlborough omitted Webb's name from the despatch which announced the victory, yet corrected his error a few days later when he had better knowledge. His enemies pounced upon this incident, accused him of betraying Webb, and said that he was jealous; the story appears in Thackeray's novel, and many people still believe the silly insinuation. At last Lille fell, and Ghent and Bruges were recovered.

The Whigs fail to make peace. The House of Commons under the Triennial Act had in 1703—5 been mostly Tory, in 1706—8 half Tory and half Whig; at the election in the autumn of 1708 there was a Whig majority. Marlborough and Godolphin definitely, though reluctantly, joined the Whigs to gain their support in the war. Peace was again discussed in 1709, and Louis was willing to abandon the cause of his grandson Philip. The Whigs and the Dutch required some guarantee that he was in earnest; he was to help them to expel Philip from Spain, a demand which did not meet with Marlborough's approval. The insult was too great; Louis declared that, if he must fight, he would rather fight for than against his own flesh and blood. He appealed to the patriotism of all classes in France, and not in vain. The capable Villars, who had never yet faced Marlborough, was put in command, and down to the lowest ranks all served with the utmost enthusiasm and without pay.

The allies besieged and took Tournai on the Schelde, and advanced on Mons. Villars came up to Malplaquet on the border ten miles off, and constructed some strong entrenchments between two woods. Marlborough and Eugene stormed the lines with very great loss, and then Mons fell. But Villars had covered himself with glory, for he lost only 12,000 men and the allies 20,000; it was the biggest battle of the war, and some 100,000 fought on each side. Then an outcry rose in England against such a slaughter, an unfair outcry, because in every war there must be losses.

The Tories and peace at any price. The storm against Marlborough came now to a head. He and the Whigs were accused of prolonging the war needlessly; the late failure to make peace, due to the cruel demand made upon Louis, had been followed by needless slaughter; the National Debt was mounting up, and, men said, it paid the Whig merchants to go on fighting because they lent the money to government and got six per cent. interest, which Tory gentlemen paid out of the Land Tax. Why should England spend gold and blood to fight an Austrian Archduke's battles, and to win border fortresses for the Dutch? Why indeed, except that my lord of Marlborough might win glory? These arguments are clearly wrong. Marlborough was not to blame for the peace fiasco, but his Whig friends; the outcry about Malplaquet was unfair; the allies were winning victories for us as much as we for them, for the English were never more than a fifth or sixth of the entire allied army, France was being so weakened that the triumphs of Wolfe and Clive a half-century later were really due to Marlborough. No man could foresee the great expansion of our world-empire, which this war rendered possible, but it was very clear that we were not merely fighting to please the Dutch and Austrians. Marlborough, however, made the great mistake of requesting Anne to create him Captain-General for life. Fear of military despotism, fear that he would be the new Oliver Cromwell¹ at the head of a victorious standing army, was at the heart of the nation.

Great issues and petty occasions are often mixed together. Robert Harley, the Tory leader, got the ear of Queen Anne through Mrs Masham. A certain Dr Sacheverell preached a political sermon against Godolphin and the Whigs, was prosecuted and condemned, and became a popular martyr. The outburst of fury of virtuous churchmen against the Whigs occurred just at the time when nation and queen alike were weary of war. But the lady and the preacher occasioned rather than actually caused the Tory reaction; they were the match, not the gunpowder. Without waiting for the end of its third year Anne dissolved Parliament in 1710 and dismissed Godolphin. The Tories got a majority at the autumn election, and Robert Harley and Henry St John formed a Tory ministry.

¹ Sir J. R. Seeley, Growth of British Policy, vol. II, especially p. 346.

The Duke's position in 1710 and 1711^{*} was much weakened. He had no longer control of the organization for war. He and Eugene captured more fortresses on French soil, and outwitted the heroic Villars. But a new campaign in Spain ended in failure, Madrid was occupied once more, and once more evacuated, as in 1706 by Lord Galway, for the Spaniards were resolute to stand by Philip; such a mere isolated campaign was altogether against Marlborough's views. Harley was working secretly for peace. The Duchess was dismissed by Anne, and the Duke was attacked on the ground that he appropriated money from the bread-contracts. His defence was clear, he had taken this money, but it was his secret service fund, and no general was ever better served by his spies and scouts. But the chance was too good to be lost, and he was dismissed in order that peace might be made.

Since the end of 1710 Jonathan Swift had been writing on the side of the Tories and peace. His bitter attacks upon Marlborough evidently caught the popular fancy, especially a pamphlet The Conduct of the Allies. We can also trace his motives in a diary written to the lady whom he afterwards married, The Journal to Stella. He hoped that Harley would at least make him a bishop in reward for his services. He wrote more strongly than Steele and Addison, the Whig scribes, and even Defoe had not such influence. Of course we can easily understand Swift and Harley and St John: they wanted peace, and Marlborough must go. But it is indeed strange that people to-day should accept all the venomous abuse against him as if it was literally true.

A political reason and a commercial reason combined to make peace really necessary. The Archduke Charles, after the death of his father and of his elder brother, was elected to be Emperor; if he were also king of Spain, it would upset the Balance of Power. The Tory ministers could not easily borrow money for war, for Whig merchants mistrusted them and would not lend. One thing alone remained: the House of Lords was strongly Whig, and so Anne had to be persuaded to create a dozen Tory peers to secure a peace majority; Lord Masham, husband of the favourite, was one of them. The Duke of Ormonde, Marlborough's successor, did nothing in 1712; Eugene and the Germans, left alone, were beaten by Villars. The peace, discussed in 1712, was finally signed at Utrecht in Holland in 1713.

The Peace changes the map of Europe. The Frenchman Philip was to remain king of Spain and the Spanish Indies, but the Crowns of France and Spain were never to be united. Therefore after a victorious war the first object of the war was lost. On the one hand we see that twice had the allies taken and evacuated Madrid, that the Archduke was now Emperor, and that in the exhausted condition of France Philip might safely be left to be king. On the other hand, in the future France and Spain would be sure to be allies against us. Catalonia was handed over to the tender mercies of Philip and the Castilians.

The Spanish Netherlands were awarded to Charles as compensation. Thus in the now Austrian Netherlands both England and Holland would find a friend. The Dutch were to garrison the border fortresses; the great port of Antwerp was to remain closed to commerce. So, after all, his new possession was not very valuable to Charles.

England gained Gibraltar and Minorca at the expense of Spain; Hudson Bay, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and one West India island, at that of France. Here we have a definite recognition of England as a Mediterranean power, to which the ship-money fleet of Charles I, Blake's exploits, and the temporary possession of Tangier by Charles II, had led the way. Also by the Asiento clause England secured the right to sell negro slaves in the Spanish Indies, and to send one trading ship a year to the Isthmus of Panama. But of course England's chief gain was the humiliation of Louis; France was permanently weakened, and the conquest of Canada and India was made possible.

In Italy, Naples, Lombardy and Milan went to Charles of Austria; and Sicily to the Duke of Savoy.

The last years of Anne. Harley had been made Earl of Oxford, St John was Viscount Bolingbroke. Very naturally under a Tory régime an attempt was made to satisfy zealous churchmen. The Occasional Conformity Act was passed in 1711 to stop the practice by which dissenters evaded the Test Act. The Schism Act also forbade them to teach. Both were repealed in the next reign.

But the question of greatest interest was the succession. Oxford was for George of Hanover, Bolingbroke schemed to bring in James III. Now a Stuart was not personally very acceptable to Bolingbroke; but he hated the idea of a German king who would be the nominee of Parliament, and he wanted a strong Crown independent of Party Government. He intrigued with Lady Masham to set Anne against Oxford, and finally secured his dismissal for the exquisite reason that he was discourteous to her and unpunctual. Then Bolingbroke and Ormonde set to work to bring reliable Jacobite officers into the army. But it was too late. Anne died suddenly, and George I was proclaimed in accordance with the Act of Settlement.

No account of Anne's reign would be complete without some mention of the great prose writers. The political works of Defoe and Swift have been noticed, and of course Robinson Crusoe and Gulliver are well known. Richard Steele began a new kind of writing, amusing little articles on events of the time and on imaginary characters of the time, which he published in the Tatler and the Spectator. Joseph Addison followed his lead. The sayings and doings of Sir Roger de Coverley, a not over-wise, but very dear old gentleman, his servants and friends, his adventures in the country and in town, give a charming picture of contemporary life and make delightful reading. We learn of the state of the London streets, the coffee-houses and the political and other talk therein, the theatre, the quarter-sessions at a country town, the fashions, and so on. Steele originated this kind of essay, but Addison is the more charming writer. Their essays will always be read when the fierce political and religious pamphlets of this and earlier reigns have no interest for us. The novel as a means of giving a picture of life came in some years later. The chief poet of the day was Alexander Pope.

NOTE ON THE ELECTORS

In the Middle Ages, owing to troubles and wars in Germany as to who should be Emperor, a system of election was established. Seven chief men were formed into a College of Electors to choose a King of the Germans, who, when duly instituted, became the Holy Roman Emperor; for many centuries the choice fell upon the Archduke of Austria, of the family of Hapsburg. The seven were the Archbishops of Mainz (Mayence), Trier (Trèves), and Koln (Cologne), the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Saxony, the "Margraf" of Brandenburg¹, and the Count Palatine. The Thirty Years' War upset Germany very much and a new elector appeared, the Duke of Bavaria; and in 1692 the Duke of Brunswick became Elector of Hanover. See pp. 202, 249, 343, 366, 440.

¹ Margraf means "Count of the Mark or border district" of Brandenburg, a title still borne by the King of Prussia.

THE HOUSE OF HANOVER, 1714--

GEORGE I, 1714—1727

THE SOUTH SEA BUBBLE; WALPOLE PRIME MINISTER, 1721.

Many people sneer at our early Hanoverian kings, but let us be fair to them. If Great Britain had need of a foreigner for its king, it is not good manners to blame him for being a foreigner, whether he be William III or George I. We ought not to consider it a crime that each of them was fond of his native land. In the reign of George II the personal connection of Great Britain and Hanover was of great political importance, it gave us an ally in the heart of Germany and thus helped us to hold the balance against France. Later, some of Wellington's best soldiers in the Peninsula and at Waterloo were Hanoverians.

Supremacy of the Whig Oligarchy. Parliament by the coming of George I was more powerful than it had ever been before. The Whigs were in power for years, and their chief idea was that Parliament should be stronger than King. But they never saw that any other power should be stronger than Parliament, and they regarded both Houses almost as their private property. Public Opinion was to them less important than the triumph of their Party. Members were elected to the House of Commons by small towns which had been important under Edward I, by villages which had been chosen by Edward VI or Elizabeth, by small as well as large and thickly populated counties; and in both boroughs and counties very few men had votes.

The Whig leaders combined together to secure the election of their friends, by their wealth as great landowners, by direct and indirect bribery, which they called "influence." The Tories were out-voted except in a few counties; rightly or wrongly they were considered to be Jacobites at heart. If ever there were political troubles in these two reigns, we see one set of Whigs quarrelling with another set of Whigs, and the Tories hardly counted. Whoever was the chief man of the time,—from 1721 for twenty years onwards it was Sir Robert Walpole,—used the royal patronage as he chose; bishops, judges, colonels, civil servants, even quite subordinate clerks, were chosen in the king's name from among the minister's friends. Such was the Whig "oligarchy," the government by a few, merely a ring of powerful statesmen, who bribed and ruled in the name of George I and George II as if king and country belonged to them. Just now and again Public Opinion made itself heard, as when Walpole was forced to declare war in 1739 because Jenkins' ear had been cut off, and when Pitt's popularity brought him to power in 1757.

When George I's first Parliament met, Anne's Tory ministers were impeached. Oxford had to be released because no act of treason could be brought against him. Bolingbroke and Ormonde fled to France and attached themselves to the Pretender; in their absence they were attainted, and this means that if they returned they would be executed without further trial, as were Thomas Cromwell and Strafford. Marlborough was restored to office, but "the brain packed in ice" was worn out; when at the height of his fame he used to suffer from brain-fatigue after some great effort, and now he was unable to enjoy his restored power.

The Old Pretender and "The Fifteen." In 1715 an effort was made in Scotland to proclaim the Pretender as James III. A few clans rose under the Earl of Mar, but there was no general enthusiasm. Mar met the government's troops at Sheriffmuir, a few miles north of Stirling, in that district which has seen so many battles; it was a drawn battle, but as good as a defeat for Mar. James landed next year, but finding his cause hopeless departed again. Louis XIV was dead; without help from France and without enthusiasm the Jacobites had no chance. A few Englishmen who rose in the north under Thomas Forster were easily crushed. Henceforward many Tories talked treason against George and drank to the health of "the king over the water," but after-dinner talk does not lead to action.

Owing to troubles thus early in the reign Parliament passed the Riot Act. If a mob is dangerous, a magistrate may "read the Act" and order it to disperse, and after an hour may order soldiers to fire. The general election ought to have been held in 1717 under the Triennial Act; but Parliament passed the Septennial Act fixing a seven years' limit. With the consent of King and Lords, the Commons coolly prolonged their life for four years more. But nothing shows more clearly the elasticity of the British Constitution; the nation was quite content not to have an election so soon after the Jacobite rising, and then consented to the Act being permanent. Of course the sovereign can at any time dissolve Parliament before the seven years are over.

Foreign policy was always influenced by the existence of the Pretender. For the time being France would have nothing to do with him; the Duke of Orleans was regent for Louis XV, great-grandson of Louis XIV, and being jealous of Philip of Spain courted the friendship of Great Britain; indeed for the next twenty years France and Spain were quite unfriendly. Naturally therefore the Pretender looked to Spain for support. That country hated Great Britain, having lost the Netherlands and Italy, Minorca and Gibraltar, and was eager to break the Treaty of Utrecht. Once a small expedition reached Scotland, but the attempt to raise the Highlanders failed. On another occasion a Spanish fleet sailed to Sicily; without declaration of war, as at Utrecht Sicily had been given to the Duke of Savoy and no declaration was necessary, Admiral Byng fell upon it and destroyed it off Cape Passaro. Ultimately, by consent of the European powers, Sicily and Naples were given to the second son of King Philip. The Duke of Savoy took Sardinia, and became King of Sardinia.

Charles XII of Sweden was a war-loving monarch, and you will remember that Marlborough had dissuaded him from making alliance with Louis XIV. He had, instead, invaded Russia and experienced a crushing defeat at Pultowa, nearly 700 miles away from the Baltic, a defeat foreshadowing in some degree the future ruin of Napoleon. He returned at length to find Sweden no longer one of the great military powers as under Gustavus Adolphus. George laid claim to some land which he had held in Germany, and Charles vowed vengeance and threatened to take up the cause of the Pretender, but he was killed in Norway. Dr Johnson takes him as an example of "the vanity of human wishes":

"He left a name, at which the world turned pale,
To point a moral or adorn a tale."

Thus James III did little harm to George. Only when Britain was engaged in a serious war, and had the regular army abroad, would the Jacobites be dangerous. The Government was very lenient towards the rebels of "the fifteen," and could afford leniency.

The South Sea Company Scare. There was a split between the Whig ministers, General Stanhope and Lord Sunderland remained in power, Sir Robert Walpole and Townshend went out of office. During the Stanhope-Sunderland administration occurred the great commercial panic.

The South Sea Company had been formed in Anne's reign to take advantage of the Asiento Treaty by which Spain granted to England a yearly ship and the trade in negroes. This Company and the Government made a bargain concerning the National Debt, which stood at 54 millions. Now the debts of a country are like those of an individual. I may owe five or six sums to different people each at a different and high rate of interest; I know that I can pay in time, and ask some honest money-lender to lend me one large sum at one fixed and fairly low rate of interest; now I owe all to one man alone, and can pay off the others. Just so the Government handed over the National Debt to the South Sea Company, and the public creditors became its share-holders; the Company would pay to them their interest, some at 6, some at 8 per cent.; Government would pay to the Company 5 per cent., and moreover receive over and above the bargain a bonus or lump-sum of 7 millions. No one would dream of paying 6 or 8 and receiving only 5 for the mere pleasure of being out of pocket, let alone the big bonus. The Company hoped to make great profits out of the Spanish trade with the Government's help. There was no fraud, for the trade was real. But people expected to make large fortunes quickly, and rushed to buy shares in the Company, till the £100 stock ran up to £1100. Other companies were formed and some were swindling affairs. Suddenly the public took fright and wanted to sell out; down ran the stock to £135, and a panic set in.

Stanhope died during the excitement, Sunderland escaped censure in Parliament by only three votes, another minister committed suicide, another was found guilty of receiving bribes. Walpole came into power. He took the 7 millions to save the share-holders from complete ruin. The National Debt he took back from the Company, and paid the old creditors the old rates of interest. So England settled down again after this period of speculation or commercial gambling. The Company went on with its proper trade with the Spanish colonies, until Spain, who hated the trade, gave one million to put a stop to it. Other commercial bodies, the East India Company and the Hudson Bay Company, always kept to legitimate business and in the future added valuable possessions to our empire.

Walpole our first "Prime Minister." Walpole's fame was now secure, and from 1721 he held power for over twenty years. As a finance-minister he gradually reduced the National Debt by proper means; trade was good and so he borrowed money at 4 per cent., and paid off some of the old 8 per cent. debts. His pupil, Henry Pelham, continued to do the same afterwards, until at last 3 per cent. was the regular rate for the whole debt.

Next we admire him as a peace-minister. Peace was necessary if public debts were to be reduced. Our country needed a good breathing-space after Anne's long war. Spain frequently seemed inclined to quarrel, but not till 1739 did war break out. Unfortunately in the name of economy both army and navy were brought low.

He was our first prime minister, and the title was a nickname. Under William III and Anne the system of Party Government had been growing up, and ministers were chosen from the party with most votes in the Commons; the chief ministers formed a Cabinet, and usually one man was most important in the Cabinet, at one time Godolphin, at another Harley. Now Walpole was so much more dominating than the other ministers that he was nick-named the Prime Minister; and his predominance was more obvious because the Hanoverian king knew no English and did not attend cabinet meetings. Step by step it came about that every minister had to agree with him or to resign. "He never could endure a rival." "He was moderate in exercising power, not equitable in engrossing it." Many of his friends had to go, Townshend, Pulteney, Carteret, Chesterfield. Therefore he had to face a very strong Opposition of discontented Whigs, while in the Cabinet "no man durst wag a finger against him." Gradually after his time it came to be recognised that all the members of a Cabinet must agree together, and that all are jointly responsible for what each of them does, while the leader of the party decides what policy is to be pursued.

But the fame of Walpole is sadly dimmed by his system of political bribery. He used all his own influence and all the royal patronage to secure for himself votes in Parliament. There was bribery of this kind in previous reigns, especially when Harley was in power, but Walpole made the system a scandal.

His strongest opponent was not in Parliament. Bolingbroke could not get on well with the Pretender, and at last was allowed to return to England. He got back "two-thirds of himself," his right to live and his property, but not the other third, his seat in the Lords. He proceeded to use his pen, which was as mighty as his tongue. He attacked the system of Party Government, and denounced Walpole and the Whigs in general as selfish and unpatriotic; his one idea was that England should have a "Patriot King" who would stand above Party and put a stop to Party evils¹.

Era of Scientific Farming. When Townshend broke with Walpole he retired into private life. He devoted himself to improving his country estate at Rainham in Norfolk, and introduced the system of growing turnips on a large scale. It was found that when wheat and barley were alternated with turnips it was unnecessary to let the land lie fallow. Moreover the roots provided winter feed for cattle, and thus breeding was very greatly encouraged. Townshend also made experiments in manuring the ground. In fact scientific modern farming dates from his time. The agricultural classes benefited enormously, for they had been in a bad way ever since the great spoliation in the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI, and all the political movements from the time of Charles I to William III had done them little good. Townshend's work was carried on at the end of the 18th and the first part of the 19th centuries by Coke of Norfolk, Earl of Leicester, and by the Dukes of Bedford. It is only in our own day that corn-growing in England has ceased to pay, however scientifically a man may farm?

¹ Some of the best of Macaulay's work is to be found in his Essays on Horace Walpole and on Chatham. He was deeply influenced by Burke, and disliked Bolingbroke very much.

In spite of the disturbances of the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI the land was generally held and farmed under old conditions. Villeinage and forced labour was dead, but small holders and copy-holders had their scattered strips of land and their right to pasture animals on the village common. It was now felt that this was a wasteful system and that the land might be made more productive. Gradually during the 18th and the early years of the 19th century a re-arrangement was made, now in this village and now in that, so that each piece of land should be compact; gradually the large land-holders bought out the small men, enclosed the commons, and greatly increased their estates. The result was that the land was much more productive, and farming on a large scale may be said to have saved England from starvation in the Napoleonic period when the growth of the population was outstripping the food supply of the country. On the other hand most small holders sank to be mere labourers; no longer had each man his cow on the common, and thus milk disappeared from the country-man's diet.

GEORGE II, 1727—1760

JENKINS' EAR, 1739. AUSTRIAN SUCCESSION, 1742.

TREATY OF AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, 1748.

THE SEVEN YEARS' WAR, 1756—1762.

PLASSEY, 1757. QUEBEC AND QUIBERON BAY, 1759.

In the House of Hanover it seemed as if every Prince of Wales was fated to be his father's enemy. George II, therefore, was expected to get rid of Walpole as soon as ever his father was dead. But the Prime Minister was too useful, and soon he had the new king's favour. Also Queen Caroline supported him. So he continued to rule both cabinet and country as under George I. Yet the Opposition grew stronger. Some young statesmen of ability were elected to the Commons, William Pitt and Henry Fox among them, who were against Walpole. He sneered at them as the "boy patriots," but they finally contributed to his downfall. Pitt sat for Old Sarum or Salisbury, a "rotten borough," which had been bought up by his grandfather, Governor Pitt of Madras. Frederick Prince of Wales headed the discontented Whigs, and his adviser was the ex-Tory Bolingbroke, the author of the "Patriot King." Thus to be a patriot was to be against Walpole and George II.

Armed smuggling and War on Spain. At last the long rule of Walpole came to an end. As in the old days of Hawkins and Drake, the Spaniards hated any English trade with their colonies. The spirit of buccaneering was still alive, and the one yearly ship permitted by treaty was not enough. The merchants of Jamaica smuggled goods into the Spanish colonies, and the smugglers went armed; there was retaliation, and a certain Jenkins had his ear cut off by Spanish coast-guards. Then there was a loud outcry at home, Jenkins posed as a martyr, and Walpole was abused. Pitt was very bitter against him for delaying to avenge the insulted peaceful trader. But in truth this was not a war of which we can be proud. The English admiral on the Jamaica station clearly stated that "we are the authors of our own complaints"; had there been no smuggling, the Spaniards would not have armed their coast-guards. Walpole knew that there was no excuse, yet rather than resign he declared war in 1739. He foresaw trouble. "They may ring the bells now; before long they will be wringing their hands."

The fleet captured Porto Bello on the Isthmus. A sailor of whom more will be heard later, Commodore Anson, sailed in the Centurion round the world in Drake's track and brought home much plunder. But there our successes ended. Yellow fever, a more deadly foe than the Spaniard, crippled the fleet. There was a new bargain between France and Spain, a family compact, and France would sooner or later join against us. Walpole, previously attacked for not declaring war quickly, was now attacked because things were going badly. In 1742 he resigned. A new ministry was formed, partly by his old enemies such as Lord Carteret, partly by his old subordinates the Duke of Newcastle and his brother Henry Pelham. Carteret managed the foreign policy, Newcastle the bribery, and Pelham the finance. None of them was prominent enough to be called Prime Minister.

Question of the Austrian Succession. Carteret's ministry was drawn into war against France by a new European crisis. Our old ally the Archduke Charles had reigned up to 1740 as the Emperor Charles VI. Before his death he had persuaded the powers of Europe, by a document known as the Pragmatic Sanction, to recognise as his successor to his hereditary estates his daughter Maria Theresa. He died, and at once the Electors chose as Emperor one of their own number, the Elector of Bavaria; Frederick of Prussia supported him, hoping to seize Silesia, which lay between Prussia and Austria; France also supported Bavaria. Maria could only appeal to the loyalty of her Hungarians. But George II was not satisfied, in his capacity as Elector of Hanover he stood up for Maria and the Pragmatic Sanction. Carteret, who was a great favourite of George, was willing to throw the weight of Great Britain with Hanover into the war on the side of Maria against France and Prussia and Bavaria. He was following the policy of Marlborough, to help our old ally and always to oppose France. Pitt denounced Carteret as he had denounced Walpole; Britain's interests, he declared, were being sacrificed for the sake of Hanover. Some years later Pitt saw his error, and acknowledged that we in support of Hanover should weaken France by a land war, while the prize of victory was Sea Power. But for the time Carteret the pro-Hanoverian was unpopular and resigned. The Pelham brothers managed the Government, yet against their will had to continue the war begun by Carteret.

In 1743 a mixed army of British and Germans was advancing up the Main to intercept a French army which was striking through north Bavaria towards Austria; the general plan of the campaign was not unlike Marlborough's in 1704. They met at Dettingen, and here for the last time an English king fought in person, the French were beaten, but not crushed. In 1745 Marshal Saxe, son of the Elector of Saxony, who had entered the French service, invaded the Austrian Netherlands. The allies met him at Fontenoy on the Schelde, a village near Tournai and not very far from Oudenarde. A line of British and Hanoverian infantry advanced up a long gentle slope without any cover against a heavy cannonade, broke the French centre by a withering fire, but were forced back by Saxe, who rallied his wings. The young Duke of Cumberland, George's second son, had not Marlborough's genius, but the conspicuous bravery and good discipline of our men were much applauded. But at once the army was recalled home because the Young Pretender had appeared in Scotland.

Military Costume, temp. George II
(Selected from Hogarth's "March to Finchley")

The rising of the "Forty Five." Two things have to be considered at the outset. The Highlanders, mostly Camerons and MacDonalds, who hated the pro-Hanoverian Campbells, required a leader to rouse them; such was Prince Charlie, son of the Old Pretender, and known as the Young Pretender or the Young Chevalier, whose winning personality and romantic nature touched the chord of devotion in their hearts, and then they were as irresistible as under Montrose or Claverhouse. Secondly, everybody was taken by surprise; the mass of the Scottish lowlanders, the Presbyterians to a man, and the trading classes, merely looked on, and it was not difficult for a few clansmen to seize points of vantage under such conditions. The Prince landed near Moidart on the west coast on July 25, raised his standard at Glenfinnan on August 19, slipped past a small army of regulars under Sir John Cope, and entered Edinburgh on Sept. 17. Cope came round by sea and landed at Dunbar; the Highlanders marched out and fell on him at Preston Pans between Edinburgh and Dunbar at dawn on Sept. 21, when one wild rush of 2500 claymores swept away the 2300 regulars in a few minutes. A short pause ensued, and then the Prince with 6000 Highlanders moved to the Border. He reached the Solway on Nov. 8, entered Carlisle, pushed along the road where now runs the L. and N. W. Railway by Preston and Manchester, and on December 5 reached Derby. What was he to do? General Wade had a force in Northumberland, the Duke of Cumberland had come over from Flanders and was at Lichfield. There was no general rising of Jacobites or discontented Englishmen, men who had talked treason all their lives were slow to act, and in any case a mass rising of untrained gentry and rustics would have been useless. The Prince left Derby to retreat northwards the next day. Guesses as to "what might have happened if . . ." are a waste of time. He might have entered London and drawn in waverers, but unless the French held the sea and landed a large army, there could have been no permanent conquest.

The Prince was not hard pressed on his return to Scotland, but he was quite unable to capture Stirling Castle. Edinburgh Castle had never been taken, and the city was re-taken by the regulars. He beat General Hawley indeed at Falkirk, and was master of the open country still. But, as in 1645, in 1689, and in 1715, the Highlanders wanted to withdraw to their glens to enjoy their plunder after their exciting little raid. So he retired to Inverness. Cumberland came up north to take the command, restored the discipline of the English, and on April 16, 1746, destroyed the Highlanders on Culloden Moor. The steady fire of 10,000 disciplined men with guns swept away 5000 weary and disunited clansmen, though even then a few of them rushed right up to the bayonets. Cumberland deserves much credit for stemming the tide of panic and hesitation. His brutality in pursuit is inexcusable, yet it would have been absurd not to extinguish all embers of rebellion. In 1715 leniency was misinterpreted, and in 1745 a lesson had to be taught. Men cannot go near to throwing a world-wide empire into confusion, giving to France her best chance to win in India and Canada, and undoing the work of William and Marlborough, and yet not suffer for it. The Highlanders had to be disarmed, and taught never to rise again even in a romantic cause. Their distinctive dress was forbidden. No class profited by their suppression more than their lowland neighbours who were at last free from their raids and blackmail. Later on Pitt satisfied the instincts of the warlike clans by raising Highland regiments for the regular army. The Jacobite Frasers, for instance, fought on the Heights of Abraham in 1759.

A treaty of Restoration of Conquests. Deprived of their English allies, the Austrians and Dutch failed to hold back the French in the Netherlands. Marshal Saxe, the victor at Fontenoy, captured fortress after fortress, and seemed to have undone all Marlborough's work. But the Netherlands were not the only theatre of war. The Austrians beat the French in North Italy. At sea Anson and Hawke won small but decisive victories. In America a force of colonists captured Louisburg on Cape Breton Island in the mouth of the St Lawrence. In India the famous Dupleix, governor of Pondicherry, conceived the idea of ruining the English settlements, and for the first time the French and English India Companies turned from peaceful trade with the natives to fighting each other. A fleet came up from the French island of Mauritius under Admiral Labourdonnais and captured Madras. Thus early it was clearly seen that the mastery in India would go to that nation which had Sea Power. Yet in spite of Saxe and Dupleix the French had not been entirely successful.

In 1748 was arranged the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, by which conquests were to be restored on all sides. Frederick of Prussia, indeed, retained Silesia; but Maria recovered the Austrian Netherlands. The difficulty about the Austrian succession was settled by the election of her husband to be Emperor. As to what concerns ourselves, we gave back Louisburg to France and received back Madras from France. Therefore this is really a most interesting war, for now for the first time the rival countries were fighting upon both sides of the globe as well as at home, and all future wars would be sure to involve struggles in the colonies. War is like a game of chess; a move upon one side of the board influences the game at the other side. American historians think it foolish to have surrendered Louisburg for so paltry a place as Madras, and historians of India think that the French must have been mad to give up the all-important Madras for a worthless island in the Gulf of St Lawrence. Really there was an equal exchange.

Eight years of peace followed. Henry Pelham followed in Walpole's steps and devoted himself to the reduction of the interest on the National Debt, which stood at 78 millions. He brought it down to a uniform $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and after his death it fell to 3 per cent. Thus it was proved that the country had benefited by war, in spite of the outcry against Hanover, for only when trade is good can money be borrowed at such low rates. Also he reformed the Calendar. Our year was eleven days out, because leap year had not been properly calculated; by Act of Parliament eleven days were jumped.

Pelham's government was otherwise eventless. He was a quiet conciliatory man, just the opposite of Walpole, and he brought into the ministry every man of importance for fear of having a strong opposition. Even Pitt was a minister, much as George personally disliked him because of his fierce denunciation of Carteret and Hanover.

The Preaching of the Wesleys. Except for an occasional year of excitement, as when Prince Charles marched to Derby, life in England during this century was dull and prosperous. There was no enthusiasm for the House of Hanover. Everybody seemed to live for self and pocket. Religious feeling was not so intense as in the previous century; it seemed as if the fierce excitement of the long struggle between Puritan and Churchman had as it were burnt itself out, and since the coming of William of Orange the new generation were too weary of religious quarrels to follow the example of their fathers. But there was one period of startling religious revival. John and Charles Wesley, who were followed by Whitfield, shocked by the religious carelessness of the age, roused men's consciences by their heart-stirring sermons. The movement started at Lincoln College, Oxford. A band of earnest young men planned out their days by method, so many hours for work, for prayer, and for recreation, and thus they came to be nicknamed Methodists. They did not want to leave the Church, but to help the established clergy by their preaching, but they were rejected and forced to found a nonconformist body of their own. They made no effort to make themselves a political body, such as the Presbyterians of the 17th century had been. Their one aim was to convert souls from thoughtlessness and worldliness. They were most conspicuously successful in the southwest, especially amongst the miners. Doubtless many of their followers preached as loudly but less successfully, and they were called ranters. But enthusiasm in a slack age is decidedly good, and most people will acknowledge that the Church ought to have found room within itself for the Wesleyan enthusiasts.

French designs in India during Peace. Dupleix had been forced to restore Madras to our East India Company in 1748. But he schemed during the years of peace. The Mohammedan Empire of the Moguls was tottering to its fall, and many native princes had made themselves independent in all but name. One prince claimed to be Viceroy of the Deccan, and another to be Nawab of the Carnatic; Dupleix schemed to support them both and with their aid to expel the English. Governor Saunders of Madras was forced in self-defence to support the rival claimants. Thus Frenchmen and Englishmen fought each other out there while the mother-countries were at peace. Dupleix had organized a small highly disciplined force of sepoy's under French officers. But his schemes were too big. He was no soldier himself, and his best officer, the Marquis de Bussy, he sent up into the Deccan too far away to help him in the Carnatic. The home government of France did not support him at all; the French merchants out there did not understand him. He was allowed to spend the whole of his great private fortune in the service of his country without thanks or repayment. To thwart him there rose from a clerk's desk young Robert Clive. Whilst Chunda Sahib with French aid was besieging the ally of the English at Trichinopoly, 200 miles s.w. from Madras, Clive made a dash upon Arcot which was only 60 miles to the west of our capital. He seized and defended it against enormous odds in 1751; then joined his superior officer, Major Lawrence, and marched upon Trichinopoly. The French and Chunda Sahib were hopelessly defeated, and the dreams of Dupleix were ruined. The French Company sent out a successor to put a stop to war. Dupleix was recalled, and died literally of starvation in a garret in Paris. The truth is that neither England nor France was as yet ready or willing to conquer in India. Dupleix paid the price for trying to force his country to found an empire against its will.

Rivalry in America leads to new War. The seeds of the next war were sown in America, not in India. More than that: war in America caused us to renew the war in India. It is not too much to say that the fight for the river Ohio was the immediate cause of our conquest of Bengal. The French possessed in the West Indies Martinique and Guadeloupe and other islands; at the mouth of the Mississippi Louisiana; and in the north Canada, which then meant only the valley of the St Lawrence. These were all most flourishing settlements. Quebec was first founded in 1608, but the colony had been re-organized and strengthened by Louis XIV. It was separated from our colonies by an almost impassable watershed of mountain and forest. The French explorers were bold and were good friends with the Redskins; the St Lawrence tempted them to the great lakes, and from the great lakes they explored the headwaters of the Ohio and the Mississippi. In fact the mouth of that great river was discovered by exploration from Canada, not from the Gulf of Mexico. The fur trade was very valuable, and the French tried to keep it in their own hands, building many small forts and stations to protect it, especially Fort Duquesne on the Ohio. Meanwhile our colonists for very many years made no effort to explore westwards; they had plenty of land along the coast, and the long range of the Alleghany mountains shut them in and formed a barrier to expansion. But at last some Virginian explorers, George Washington amongst them, collided with the French on the Ohio. It is said that a volley fired in a chance encounter in the backwoods of America set Europe and India in a blaze.

Henry Pelham died in 1754. His brother the Duke of Newcastle was quite unable to keep the ministry together, and there were jealousies and much trouble. But even the feeble Duke saw that something must be done to help our colonists in the backwoods, where the French and Redskins were on the warpath. He shuddered at the thought of the war extending to Europe. At first only a couple of regiments under General Braddock were sent, and these were destroyed as they marched through the forest in close rank as if they were fighting on the battlefield of Fontenoy. Then fell upon the western parts of our colonies, especially on Virginia and New York, the horrible storm of Red Indian invasion supported by France. Even the gallant French general, Montcalm, who may well pass' as a type of the best French nobility, was quite unable to control his savage allies. There was a panic, and the colonies seemed quite unable to help each other. So France and England were once more at war.

European league against Prussia. In Europe the Seven Years' War broke out for quite a different reason. Maria Theresa was a proud woman, and her one aim in life was to get vengeance on Frederick of Prussia, who had despoiled her of Silesia in the last war. A strange and unnatural alliance was made between Austria and France to crush the upstart Prussia, which had always been considered quite a minor power before Frederick's time, Russia and Saxony joined the allies. What were England and Hanover to do? If our old ally Austria chose to join with France and we were obliged to be opposed to France, there was nothing for it but to desert her and join Prussia. But in 1756 England seemed in a bad way. The European war opened for us by a French attack upon Minorca. Admiral Byng, son of the victor of Cape Passaro, sailed to relieve Minorca and retreated without daring to fight. The French secured the island. A tremendous outcry arose at home, and, though Pitt tried to save him, Byng was court-martialled and shot; it was a cowardly sentence which showed mere panic, and the Frenchman Voltaire sarcastically said that it was done pour encourager les autres.

The squabbles in the ministry were numerous and uninteresting, but at last an arrangement was made. The Duke of Newcastle was to be nominal head and to manage all the bribery and patronage. Pitt, popular, enthusiastic, eloquent, somewhat theatrical in his manner, a born leader and good judge of character, extravagant of money for the country's good and scorning to enrich himself,—whereas most Whigs starved the army and filled their own pockets,—in a word, Pitt the patriot, became Secretary to manage the war. The Duke, it was said, gave everything; Pitt did everything. Lord Anson was First Lord of the Admiralty, and no better man could possibly have been found; a very clever general who had been at Fontenoy, Lord Ligonier, controlled the army; Pitt's old enemy Carteret, now known as Lord Granville, was a valuable member of the secret committee of the Government. These men, of course the Duke being excepted, launched England upon a career of conquest at a time when everyone seemed to be quaking with fear. The ministry was formed in 1757, a certain amount of success was apparent in 1758, the great year of decisive victory was 1759, only three years after panic had led to Byng's execution.

Pitt's war policy in the Seven Years. Pitt had made himself notorious in the previous war by denouncing Carteret for fighting in Germany to help Hanover. Gradually it was brought home to his mind that it was his best policy to defend Hanover with the utmost energy against the French, to force them to put all their efforts into the land war in Germany, to raise Hanoverian and other German troops in our pay together with a small body of British, whilst he poured men into America. This was the policy of winning America upon the battlefields of Germany. He helped Frederick with large sums of money to fight the Austrians and Russians, which he did most heroically against great odds, whilst from Frederick he asked for the loan of a general. Frederick gave him Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick. The most noticeable battle, though by no means the only one, was fought at Minden on the river Weser in Hanover in 1759; a line of six English and three Hanoverian regiments made an attack straight upon the French cavalry and wiped it out by their fire; but from the disobedience, or it may be cowardice, of Lord George Sackville, the English cavalry did not charge to complete the victory.

All this fighting in Germany was not so important in the eyes of Pitt as the series of attacks which he made upon the French coast year after year. An immense amount of damage was done to their shipping at St Malo, Cherbourg, and Le Havre. His object was so to cripple France that no aid could go by sea to America. He saw the value of amphibious fighting, army and navy working together; forts are half worthless when a fleet can land troops just where the admiral chooses. But his main purpose was to destroy the French fleet. The French have two large ports and arsenals, Toulon and Brest, which unluckily for them are 2000 miles apart; an English squadron at Gibraltar can cut off the Toulon ships, a squadron lying under the island of Ushant and with its home base at Plymouth can watch Brest. "Nature hates France," says a French historian; not only are Brest and Toulon thus isolated, but the ports on the Channel were then continually silted up with sand; only in the 19th century by careful dredging and great dykes of stone have Cherbourg and Boulogne been kept free. When Lord Anson and Pitt first established a blockade of the French coast they sent two fleets to throttle Toulon and Brest. Admiral Boscawen caught and beat the Toulon fleet in Lagos Bay near Cape St Vincent, on August 18, 1759. The same year Edward Hawke, when the Brest fleet escaped out of harbour after a gale, "came swooping from the west," and either destroyed or drove on shore every ship; strong wind, rocky coast, fast failing light on a November afternoon, such are the features of the battle of Quiberon Bay, the Trafalgar of George II's reign

This policy of blockade, of striking the enemy on his own coast and of converting the Atlantic into an English lake, had been conceived by Drake, and followed by Blake, against the Spaniards. Hawke and Boscawen under Anson's control first blockaded the French coast, and were the forerunners of the more famous trio Jervis, Nelson, and Cornwallis. None deserves praise above the others, each in his age did what the nation required of him. Quebec fell two months before Quiberon Bay, Napoleon broke up his camp at Boulogne two months before Trafalgar. Yet Boscawen and Hawke won Canada, and Cornwallis and Nelson saved England from invasion, because the great battles were fought as the triumphant conclusion to a long and successful blockade.

Meanwhile Pitt poured men and guns and stores into America; there were no half measures, no wearisome delays. Good men were chosen to command, steady and thorough Jeffrey Amherst, quick and resourceful James Wolfe. A threefold plan of campaign was formed. Our colonies were to be saved from French and Redskins by an invasion into their own ground¹. The left attack was to strike down the Ohio to Fort Duquesne; the central column was to push from New York up the Hudson, cross the watershed at Lake Champlain, where stood Forts Ticonderoga and Crown Point, and descend the Richelieu to the St Lawrence; the right attack by fleet and army was to capture Cape Breton Island and its strong fortress of Louisburg, and thence pierce into Canada up the St Lawrence. Step by step the programme was carried out in 1758 and 1759, in spite of a bad repulse at Ticonderoga in 1758. Montcalm fought like a hero. Greatly outnumbered, he yet made use of the natural defences of Canada. But a corrupt and vile government, unpatriotic nobles and immoral king, money-grasping courtiers, swindling contractors, held power in the France and the Canada of that day; by them, as well as by England's naval superiority, Montcalm was ruined.

¹ For map see p 393.

Louisburg having fallen in 1758, Admiral Saunders' fleet carried Wolfe and the army up the St Lawrence, and the south bank and an island opposite to Quebec were occupied. How to land on the north bank in the face of Montcalm, his 16,000 French regulars and Canadian militia, his forts and city walls, was the problem. Sea Power alone solved it. From June 26 to September 13, 1759, every device was tried, and apparently in vain. But the ships could easily take the troops up and down, to make a feint here and an attack there, while the French were wearied out by tramping parallel to them. At last the landing was effected at night from boats, and 3265 men were lined up on the Heights of Abraham, overlooking Quebec. When Montcalm hastened up to battle, the crushing fire from the British line, as at Fontenoy and Culloden and Minden, swept away the enemy in a few minutes. The importance of a battle must not be judged by numbers or by duration. To enable those few thousands to fight for a few minutes the whole strength of Great Britain had been taxed, and tens of thousands of soldiers and sailors were fighting or marching or blockading in Germany, off the coasts of Brittany and of Spain, and elsewhere in America. The deaths of Wolfe and Montcalm in battle make the Heights of Abraham known to all, and in truth they were the pick of their fatherlands' best; yet Saunders and his sailors should be remembered with them. With the fall of Quebec the fate of Canada was sealed. A last desperate attack of French troops from Montreal nearly re-captured the place in the early spring of 1760. Then British reinforcements arrived by water; and finally three armies, from Quebec, from Lake Champlain, from Lake Ontario, closed in on Montreal, and all was over.

Quebec

Pitt turned his eyes next towards the West Indies. Guadaloupe, St Lucia, and Martinique were occupied in turn; the colonial empire of France was practically ruined. Next, when the Family Compact was renewed, and Spain, frightened by the British victories, declared war, came attacks on the Spanish islands; Havana in Cuba, and Manila, the capital of the Philippines in the Pacific, were captured. But by this time Pitt, though he had designed the expeditions, was no longer minister, and George II was dead.

In India the theatre of war was at first in Bengal. A fierce young native chief, Surajah Dowlah, stirred up by France, fell upon the English settlement at Calcutta. Then was enacted the terrible tragedy of the "Black Hole," when the English prisoners were kept in a small guard-room in a horrible suffocating air, until out of 146 captives only 23 survived the slow agony of thirst. This was in 1756. Clive had been home in England and had just returned with the king's commission. He was promptly sent to Bengal, where he re-occupied Calcutta and captured the French town of Chandernagore in 1757. Then he pushed up the river Hoogly with only 900 white troops and 2100 sepoy, with which he attacked an enormous native army of about 50,000 at Plassey; but the odds were not so desperate as would appear at first sight, for the Hindoos were not of good fighting material, and half of them were under the orders of a traitor, Meer Jaffier, whom Clive had won over. This battle laid lower Bengal at Clive's feet. It was not annexed, but Meer Jaffier was made Nawab under English control.

One of Clive's comrades in arms, Colonel Ford, was sent into the Deccan and conquered a strip of coast midway between Calcutta and Madras, called the Northern Circars. Another, Colonel Coote, was sent to Madras to take the command against Count Lally. Too late the French government had seen that they had made a great mistake in neglecting to support Dupleix, and they had now sent Lally with two of the best French regiments to win back their supremacy; he was of Irish descent and a most bitter enemy of England, but was a hot-headed man with no tact, and he offended all classes at Pondicherry, the French soldiers and officers, the merchants, the priests, and above all the natives whose caste he disregarded. He was repulsed from Madras, and finally beaten by Coote at Wandewash in 1760, near Arcot, where the little armies of French and English fought desperately whilst the sepoys looked on. In 1761 Pondicherry surrendered.

Thus a war, which had commenced with fear and wild anger at the loss of Minorca, had been completely successful in each quarter of the world. We always associate these victories with the name of Pitt. Meanwhile Frederick of Prussia and Ferdinand of Brunswick had been winning victories for us as well as for Prussia in the heart of Germany. The king deservedly won the name of Frederick the Great. The wonderful stand made by him against the overpowering numbers of Russia and Austria, whilst Ferdinand fought the French, made Prussia one of the greatest military nations of Europe, a nation destined, after a period of military decline, to co-operate with us in 1815 in a final triumph.

Lastly let us notice how our ancestors had to face many different kinds of enemies and to adapt themselves to various styles of warfare. The soldiers of George II were trained to meet French regulars as in Marlborough's war, but learned by experience, and often by the bitter experience of defeat, to face rushing Highlanders, lurking Red Indians, and sepoys led by Frenchmen; even as in Victoria's reign our enemies have been wild Afghans and Afridis, Arab Dervishes, Zulus, and Boers, and our men have had to adapt themselves to the tactics of each race, while there is yet a possibility of their having to encounter continental armies of conscripts. Some people can only think of and sneer at the defeats, Preston Pans or Braddock's overthrow, Maiwand or Majuba Hill, and then talk of our "muddling through" somehow. In truth our soldiers have never muddled through, but sound and scientific leaders have learned from defeat how to organize for victory by adaptation, often in face of interfering and ignorant civilians at home. Rarely has a Pitt been at the helm.

NOTE.—THE STORY OF WOLFE AND GRAY'S "ELEGY"

The original version of this famous story is as follows. A certain John Robison was rated as a midshipman, and was serving with the Quebec expedition. "An anecdote which he used to tell deserves to be remembered. He happened to be on duty in the boat in which General Wolfe went to visit some of his posts the night before the battle. The evening was fine. As they rowed along, the general with much feeling repeated nearly the whole of Gray's 'Elegy' to an officer, adding that 'he would prefer being the author of that poem to the glory of beating the French to-morrow.'" From this simple account has arisen the legend that in the dark small hours of the morning, as the boats fell down stream in dead silence so as to take the French by surprise, Wolfe was actually foolish enough to recite poetry and risk being heard by some sentry.

GEORGE III, 1760—1820

FIRST PERIOD: TO THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

1760—1770. SEVERAL SHORT MINISTRIES.

1763. TREATY OF PARIS.

1770—1782. MINISTRY OF LORD NORTH.

1775. AMERICAN WAR BEGINS.

1777. SARATOGA.

1781. YORKTOWN AND PORTO NOVO.

1782. RODNEY'S VICTORY.

1783. THE WHIG TREATY OF VERSAILLES,
AND THE YOUNGER PITT'S MINISTRY BEGINS.

George III was grandson of George II and son of Frederick Prince of Wales. He could speak English and "gloried in the name of Briton." He had been brought up according to Bolingbroke's idea of a "Patriot King," and had been taught to believe that his first duty was to break down the supremacy of the Whigs. "George, be a king," said his mother, the Princess of Wales, who had great influence over him.

End of the Seven Years' War. The first thing was to stop the war, and for that purpose the Pitt-Newcastle combination had to be broken. Pitt had managed the war, Newcastle the bribery. So once more the old arguments were used just as against Marlborough: the Whigs had too much power, and Pitt was too prominent; the National Debt had mounted up to 139 millions; we were fighting to let all the profit go to Frederick of Prussia. An opportunity occurred when Pitt foresaw that Spain, frightened by our successes, was going to help France according to the Family Compact. He was pooh-poohed, and resigned in disgust; Spain did declare war, and the expeditions planned by him against Havana and Manila were entirely successful. But no amount of popularity could restore him to power in the face of the royal obstinacy to exclude him. Newcastle was dismissed from office. A new ministry was formed under Lord Bute, an unpopular Scot, who was thought to have too much influence over the Princess of Wales, and therefore over George.

Bute brought over some of the discontented Whigs, George Grenville, who was Pitt's brother-in-law, and Henry Fox. By their help and by much bribery the Treaty of Paris was carried through Parliament in 1763. The question was, Could all the territory won from France be retained? If not, what should be retained and what restored? Clever minds foresaw that if we kept the West India islands we should deprive France for ever of a naval base across the Atlantic; if we gave back Canada, our own colonies would always want our help against France and would never rebel. But the opposite was done. Canada was annexed; Guadaloupe, Martinique, and St Lucia, were restored to France, also Pondicherry and Chandernagore to the French India Company, and Havana and Manila to Spain. But Minorca was restored to us, this points to a principle worth noting, namely that not every outlying position need be defended; for if the war in general is successful, positions that have been lost will be regained at the final treaty. Frederick afterwards complained that he had been deserted, but at the time he was satisfied that Great Britain should pair off with France, while he settled with Austria; he too made peace with Maria Theresa and retained Silesia for good.

Four short Ministries by Rotation. The Irish orator Edmund Burke, who was then rising in reputation, has described for us the state of political parties¹. Bute resigned, because, though he had carried the treaty through Parliament by bribery, he could not manage to keep in power permanently by bribery. The different sections of the Whigs were disunited and jealous of each other. So George and Bute planned to support each section in power by Rota, and weaken each in turn by rousing the jealousy of the others. There was a Double Cabinet, the ostensible Cabinet of the Prime Minister, and the secret Cabinet of the king who thwarted the Prime Minister in every way. Meanwhile all the royal power and patronage would be used by the king for his own benefit; he would personally appoint bishops, judges, colonels, civil servants and others, and thus build up a new party, the King's Friends, who would be neither Whigs nor Tories, but George's servants. Even Jacobites were now willing to serve him, as the Pretender Charles Edward had become a broken-down drunkard. As an instance of the success of this policy we may notice the case of Corsica; when the Prime Minister said that France could not be allowed to annex that island, George secretly said that she might annex it, and she did; this was just about the date of Bonaparte's birth.

Question of the Taxation of America. From 1763 to 1765 the leading ministers were George Grenville and the Duke of Bedford. Grenville was "bred to the bar," a thorough lawyer, who only cared, when considering any policy, whether it was legal, not whether it was advisable. The Duke's party was called "the Bloomsbury gang," for he lived in that district of London and had much property there. They argued that as some 50 millions had been added to our debts by the American war, the colonists should pay a trifle; accordingly the Stamp Act was passed, ordering them to use stamped government paper for legal documents, a stamp being a proof that a legal fee has been paid. Also they revived the old Navigation Act, by which no trade could be carried on between two colonies except in a British ship. Next, they prosecuted John Wilkes, member for Aylesbury and a worthless fellow, for a scurrilous article in his paper The North Briton. Wilkes won his case in a law-court, but was expelled from the Commons and outlawed.

¹ Thoughts on the Present Discontents.

In 1765 Lord Rockingham, leader of the chief section of Whigs, formed a ministry. To this party belonged Burke. Pitt was asked to join and refused; he was really quite a non-party man, and his friends were mostly of the merchant and banking classes; he was popular and enthusiastic, while Rockingham was a cold and unenthusiastic aristocrat. The Stamp Act was repealed. Rockingham's party argued that Parliament had the legal right to tax the Americans, but that it was not wise to do so. Pitt voted for the repeal, but argued that the tax was neither constitutional nor wise; there should be, said he, no taxation without representation in the Commons.

In 1766 Pitt was persuaded by George to form a ministry on non-party lines. The Duke of Grafton joined him, and was regarded as a traitor from Rockingham's party. Pitt accepted a peerage for himself as Earl of Chatham. He was badly crippled by gout, and ill-health is an excellent reason for going up to the Lords, but he lost his popularity as the Great Commoner. Soon he was so ill that he had to retire into private life, and he even seems to have been out of his mind.

From 1767 in Chatham's absence the ministry was supposed to be led by Grafton. Charles Townshend, Chancellor of the Exchequer, against Chatham's known wishes, and against Grafton's wishes also, put new taxes on tea, glass, paper, and other articles imported into the American colonies. There is not even yet any written law that a Cabinet should be unanimous, but it is a matter of custom and common sense; all the members of a Cabinet are responsible for what one member does. At this date the principle was perhaps not fully recognised. Yet as soon as Chatham recovered his wits, he disowned Townshend's measures, and resigned rather than seem to sanction the taxation of the Americans, but the evil was already done. Well may the Chancellor be likened to Puck, an imp of mischief. At this date an anonymous writer, who signed himself "Junius," contributed some very bitter letters to the Public Advertiser. He seems to have been Sir Philip Francis, and wrote under the influence of Lord Temple, Chatham's elder brother-in-law, who hated to see Chatham allied with Grafton¹. Burke also now wrote strongly, but he was a gentleman; Junius' attacks upon Grafton were spiteful and vulgar. It is only the mystery of the authorship that makes us care at all about him.

Wilkes had returned to England. At the end of the seven years of Parliament in 1767 he stood and was elected for Middlesex, was rejected by the Commons, and was again elected. There was much excitement and rioting, but the Commons gave the seat to his defeated opponent. However, seven years later Wilkes was once more elected and took his seat, then he lost his popularity and was no longer a martyr. He was also Alderman in the City of London, and with the help of the city stood up for the rights of the Press to print speeches made in Parliament. As regards Wilkes let us now sum up. Have the Commons the right to expel a member? Has an outlaw, or any disqualified person, the right to stand for a shire or borough; or have the Commons the right to say that this or that man may not stand? Has Parliament the right to prevent the printing of speeches? The Commons still claim to have such rights. But Public Opinion, which was strong even then, is very strong to-day; and Public Opinion usually makes its voice prevail. Wilkes gained his point at last. A similar case occurred in 1880, when Charles Bradlaugh, being elected for Northampton, was not allowed to take his seat; in 1835 he was elected and allowed to sit.

¹ Sir William Anson's Introduction to Grafton's Letters.

Lord North's twelve years of Power. In 1770 George thought himself strong enough to create a ministry of the King's Friends alone under Lord North, son of the Earl of Guilford. George had successfully in the previous ten years built up by patronage and bribery this party which was no party. He had a large public and private income, yet he was already deeply in debt. He was very frugal and simple in his life—he was known as Farmer George—and this debt was incurred, not by luxury, but by the purchase of votes in the Commons against the Whigs. Thus the policy of Walpole, who used the royal patronage for the benefit of the Whigs, was at last reversed. The King's Friends were Tories under a new name.

We have seen how the Americans had been taxed by Grenville and Townshend; North abolished all the taxes but one, the ever famous tea-duty. Now notice the wonderful results of a world-empire. By his Regulating Act of 1773 North allowed the East India Company to import tea direct from China to America without paying the English duty; the colonists thought this to be a trick to get them to acknowledge the American duty when they got their tea cheaper. We turn as usual to Burke. It was not, he said, a question of 3*d.* more or less on a pound of tea, but of temper and character. The colonists' temper was up; they resented the thwarting of their inter-colonial trade by the Navigation Act, and the garrisoning of their ports by soldiers to compel the payment of the tea-duty. As for character, the men of Massachusetts and New England generally were descended from English Puritans, and had the spirit of obstinacy and resistance in their blood; the Virginians and Marylanders were Cavaliers by birth, but were slave-owners, and all who have slaves are quick to assert their own liberties. It is a pity that Burke did not carry his argument a step further. The British also had a temper; they had fought France in 1757 when the colonists were quite unable to unite and defend themselves; they had annexed Canada and beaten down the Redskins, adding 50 millions to the National Debt; yet the colonists grudged a few thousands as a trifling contribution to the up-keep of the soldiers defending them. True, would be the reply; but you British have the monopoly of all our trade. Stiff-necked ingratitude was opposed to domineering pride. No arguments can avail when such a temper is roused.

Riot and outbreak of war at Boston. The New Englanders were the leaders of discontent. In Boston they amused themselves by stoning the soldiers; on one occasion in sheer desperation some of the victims fired, and then was raised a cry of murder. The case was so bad that not even a colonial jury could convict the captain who was put on his trial. When some tea-ships entered Boston harbour, men dressed up as Indians boarded them and threw the chests into the sea. Parliament ordered the custom-house to be transferred from Boston to Salem, and this meant that no goods at all could be landed at Boston. Massachusetts was deprived of its charter and made a Crown Colony; it lost its assembly and self-government, and was to be governed absolutely by a Governor of the king's choosing. Quite the most important thing to be remembered is that the other colonies, especially Virginia, backed up Massachusetts. Twelve of them sent members to a Congress at Philadelphia, which was an act of defiance. The spark was applied to the gunpowder in 1775 when some British soldiers from Boston marched inland to seize arms and stores at Concord; on their way back they were sniped from behind cover and suffered severely.

The country was up. The colonial militiamen were hardy out-of-doors men, good shots, and enthusiastic in their cause. Would they be able to organize themselves for a long and stern struggle? When powder and victuals ran short, when enthusiasm cooled down, and jealousy began to show itself between colony and colony, would they last out? This was the problem that faced George Washington. The jealousy he frequently soothed away; he, a Virginian, whose fame in the Seven Years' War had been high, being elected to the chief command of the united colonists in Massachusetts, was thus a conspicuous example of colonial unity. Yet the task at times seemed to be too hard even for him. Reinforcements of troops came out from England under Sir William Howe. The colonists occupied Breed's Hill on the north side of the harbour opposite to Boston; Howe's men were twice beaten back with loss, but finally carried the hill. The action—a typical action of regulars against irregulars—is generally known as the battle of Bunker's Hill from the name of some rising ground behind Breed's Hill.

Let us see what advantages were on the side of the British. They had full command of the sea and could land at any place on the coast. Canada was loyal, and the attacks of the Americans in that direction failed. There was discipline as against superior numbers. But the usual result of twelve years of peace was seen. The army had been cut down, and of what use was Sea Power when the home government had not enough men to send over the sea to nip the revolt in the bud, or to profit by colonial jealousies? German mercenaries were procured, and the colonists cried out against the use of hirelings to suppress them, though they had not objected to Pitt's employment of Germans on their behalf in the Seven Years' War. Both sides tried to enlist Redskins; the government officials had always been kinder than the colonists, and the savages naturally preferred to fight for the British. The idea is quite horrible to our minds, and Chatham was right in denouncing in Parliament the employment of such allies. Yet it remains that the colonists were equally guilty, though less successful in winning them over.

Scene of war shifted to New York. In 1776 Howe evacuated Boston and carried off his troops to Halifax. Thence he sailed to Long Island, beat Washington, occupied Brooklyn and New York, and threatened by the occupation of the line of the Hudson to cut Massachusetts off from the southern colonies. New York was a fine central base for such a purpose. Meanwhile Lord North tried to conciliate

Boston Harbour with "Bunker's Hill"

Cambridge, where is Harvard University, is just to the left outside the plan the colonists, but it was too late. The Congress at Philadelphia by the majority of one vote passed the Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776. It was no longer a struggle for free trade and liberty from taxation, but for national rights. Washington, though beaten by Howe, was very active. He tried to raise a small permanent disciplined army of colonists as a nucleus round which the masses of militiamen could rally on occasions; if the Americans were to be a nation, they must have a national force. He was not very successful so far, but in the winter he surprised Howe's outposts and inflicted considerable damage.

War on the Delaware and the Hudson. In 1777 the plans of the British were more ambitious. Unluckily they were dictated by an incompetent civilian minister, Lord George Germaine, who was the Lord George Sackville cashiered for cowardice at Minden. To dictate from home to generals 3000 miles away is obviously to court disaster. Also he failed to inform one general what he had ordered another to do. The plan of campaign was radically bad; there were to be two campaigns in different directions from two separate bases, and such a thing is only possible when the telegraph is available. Howe from New York sailed round to Chesapeake Bay, landed and beat Washington twice, and captured Philadelphia. In face of these defeats Washington showed his marvellous tenacity; during the winter he maintained himself with a small force of half-starved and badly equipped men in Valley Forge, and it was with this little standing army that he saved the middle colonies.

Meanwhile Sir John Burgoyne collected an army in loyal Canada, half British, half German, 8000 men in all. He crossed the watershed by Lake Champlain, and commenced to descend the Hudson towards New York; it was an excellent plan, being the exact reverse of the plan of the attack upon Canada in 1759, but it required the co-operation of Howe ascending the Hudson from New York. Howe in ignorance of Germaine's orders to Burgoyne was away in Philadelphia; Burgoyne under strict orders from Germaine, in place of fortifying himself on Lake Champlain, felt bound to plunge southwards with too small an army. At Saratoga on the Hudson he was surrounded by an overpowering force of militia under a very clever leader named Arnold, though Gates, a superior officer, arrived in time to take all the glory for himself. The whole army capitulated, October 16, 1777.

Howe was forced next year to evacuate Philadelphia and fall back to New York.

France decides to help America. The surrender at Saratoga led to France joining in the war; she was only too ready to help those who could help themselves. It was a very remarkable alliance. To humiliate us and to recover Canada France now allied with the Americans and fought us. But the strange thing is that we had in the Seven Years fought France to help these very same Americans in the time of their utmost need.

France had in some degree regained her good sense and patriotism, which had been lost in the iniquitous reign of Louis XV. Louis XVI was now king, an honest if not very clever man, under whom both army and navy had been re-organized and wonderfully improved. The practical result of the French alliance was that our Sea Power was at once challenged; a drawn battle was fought to the west of Brest, and a drawn battle was as bad as a defeat. In 1779 Spain joined in, under the terms of the Family Compact; in 1780 war broke out with the Dutch, because we insisted on our right to search neutral ships for contraband of war, the guns and ammunition and supplies which their merchants poured into America. In India arose the most formidable enemy that we ever have had to face there, Hyder Ali of Mysore. This is the only modern war in which we have had no allies.

Chatham had always hated the American War; yet he wanted to conciliate the colonists, not to allow them entire independence. Now his soul was on fire at the idea of granting such independence at the dictation of his old enemy France. He felt that abject submission to both France and the rebels would have been a fatal weakness, and peace could not have been bought except by the surrender of Canada and all our West Indies. But Chatham was fast breaking up, and after a speech in the Lords he fell down in a fit and was taken home to die. The Whigs, in particular Charles James Fox, applauded American successes. The very bitter feuds between the parties did much harm; every military or naval engagement was fiercely criticised, and Tory commanders were abused by the Whigs and vice versa. A nation should be calm and united in a period of danger.

Final French and American triumph. For five years more Great Britain held out against all the allies. Not only was the war continued in America, but both ships and soldiers had to be sent to all parts of the world; in fact a larger fleet was maintained than at any period of our history before the Napoleonic crisis. A squadron faced the Dutch in the North Sea; another held the English Channel against the combined French and Spaniards, and indeed only an outbreak of plague on the dirty Spanish ships, which spread to the French ships, saved us from actual invasion, Gibraltar and Minorca had to be defended, help had to be sent to save Madras; and the main fleet was alternately off the American coast and in the West Indies. The crisis brought to the front many great sailors, Lord Howe, the general's elder brother, Samuel Hood, and George Rodney. Our Sea Power, though challenged, finally saved us from great disaster. Also our enemies, though numerous, were not united in their aims; Spain, for instance, only cared to re-gain Gibraltar, and thus the French had to detach part of their strength to attack the rock.

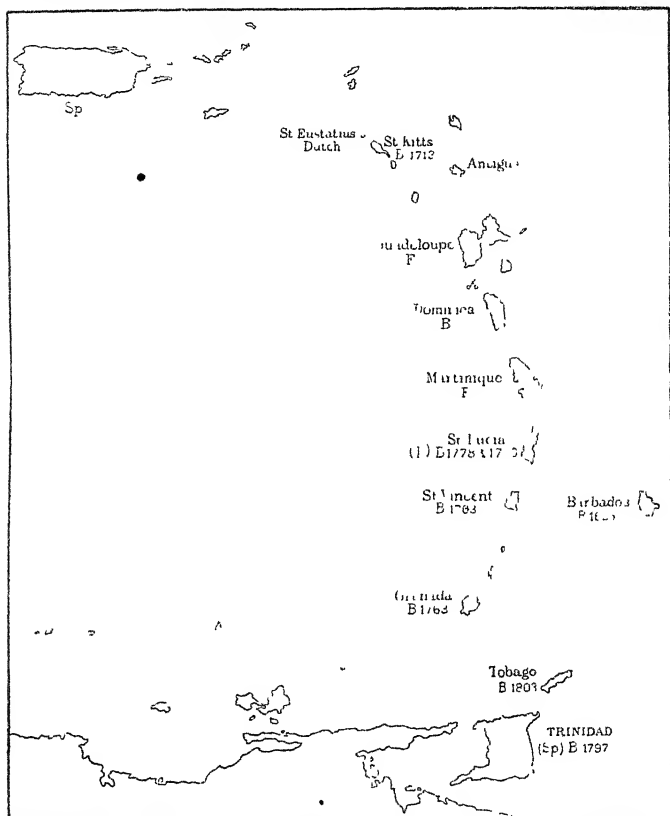

Between 1778 and 1781 our men did well. The army from New York sailed against Charleston in South Carolina under the command of Sir Harry Clinton, who had superseded William Howe, and took it. But only the ground within the range of the British guns was occupied; there was no complete subjugation of the Carolinas at large, where a very able general, Nathaniel Greene, who however was the lasting jealousy between colony and colony, and Washington was at times in despair. Massachusetts, for instance, now that there was no war in the immediate neighbourhood, had little wish to fight for Virginia and Carolina. Relations between the French and the Americans became strained; the colonists asked why their allies had not already beaten the British and captured New York. In the West Indies a British expedition seized and cleverly defended St Lucia, which was henceforward the headquarters of the fleet.

So the war was not going altogether badly for us till the autumn of 1781. Then occurred a series of misunderstandings, largely due to the interference of Germaine. Lord Cornwallis marched into Virginia and took up a position on the south coast of Chesapeake Bay. The French fleet arrived upon the scene from the West Indies; our fleet was insufficient in numbers and badly handled by Admiral Graves, to the great disgust of Samuel Hood. Then Washington, making a feint as though he would attack New York, massed a great force of some 7000 French and 10,000 Americans, and brought them into Virginia. Hemmed in by French fleet, and French and American army, Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown, October 19, 1781; some 4000 British and 2500 Germans laid down their arms, and 2000 more were in hospital. This second surrender, just four years after Saratoga, was decisive; French naval superiority had won the much desired revenge.

But in another part of the world this same year the exact opposite took place. Warren Hastings raised every man and every rupee that he could spare to save Madras from the terrible Hyder Ali. Sir Eyre Coote, the veteran of Wandewash, was in command. At one time he was hemmed in between a French fleet and Hyder's army; then the British fleet appeared, the French sailed away, and Coote turning upon the Mysoreans beat them in the cleverly planned battle of Porto Novo.

British rally by sea against France. Lord North had been in power during the whole war, but early in 1782 he resigned. A Whig ministry was forced upon the king, and the Whigs were the pro-American party. But peace immediately after the surrender of Yorktown would have been fatal. Even Whigs knew that the war must be fought to the bitter end as against France and Spain. Minorca had been lost, the attacks upon Gibraltar were continued, and the French talked openly of the complete conquest of Canada and all our West Indies. Luckily George Rodney with Hood under him was in command of the navy. From his base at St Lucia he sailed out after the French fleet of the Comte de Grasse, who was steering from Martinique for an attack upon Jamaica. Off the island of Dominica on April 12, 1782, he won the great victory which will always be associated with his name. He had been introducing reforms into the navy, improving the gunnery and the signalling codes and the sanitation of his ships, and now he "cut the line" of the French fleet. Not only did he save Jamaica, but he so completely upset the self-confidence of the French that they never faced our ships again. It was one of the most critical of naval battles, though not a crushing victory like Trafalgar. There was no more talk of a conquest of Canada and Jamaica.

West Indies

Later this same year the last and fiercest bombardment of Gibraltar took place. General Eliott resisted heroically, and with red-hot shot destroyed the enemies' ships and floating batteries; he well merited his peerage as Lord Heathfield. Soon the relieving fleet arrived under Lord Howe, and the rock was safe.

The Whig government finally made the Treaty of Versailles in 1783. The Independence of the United States was acknowledged. France re-gained St Lucia, and Spain finally kept Minorca. Otherwise Louis XVI had plenty of praise and glory, but nothing else beyond the extra load of debt which led to the French Revolution. So ended a war which created a new nation. Loyal American colonists, who wished to remain under the British flag, emigrated to Upper Canada or Ontario, the land between the great lakes and French Canada; others to New Brunswick adjoining Nova Scotia.

Events at home during the war. In 1780 occurred in London the terrible Lord George Gordon Riot. There had been a proposal to grant some measure of relief to Roman Catholics. A half-witted enthusiast raised the cry of "No Popery," and stirred up the London mob. There was no proper police force in those days. Mobs had frequently assembled during the Wilkes period, and had had to be crushed by soldiers; criminals, highwaymen, poachers, smugglers, were often popular heroes, and at intervals bad riots had resulted, for instance the Porteous riot in Edinburgh in George II's reign. Now in London the scene was awful; Newgate was broken open; public houses were pillaged, so that the horror of raging drunkenness was added. At last George on his own responsibility called out soldiers and saved the city. Dickens has described the scene for us in Barnaby Rudge.

London Bridge, 1757

Ireland had been drained of troops because of the American War. To prevent a Catholic rising the government armed Protestant Volunteers, and they having arms demanded independence, much as the Americans had done. In 1782 the Whigs gave to Ireland a Parliament absolutely free from English control; laws passed under Henry VII and George I which made the Dublin Parliament subservient to that at Westminster were cancelled. From the name of a clever Irish lawyer the new body is known as Grattan's Parliament. But only Protestants could sit in it or vote at elections; bribery was as bad as in England. Yet some of the worst of the penal laws against Catholics were repealed by it. For the next eighteen years, 1782 to

Gordon Riots

1800, the only connecting link between England and Ireland was the Crown.

Rule of Warren Hastings in India. For many years we find in connection with India a series of swings of the pendulum; a period of peace and organization succeeds to a period of war and annexation. Clive wins at Plassey and annexes Bengal. Warren Hastings organizes the government, and sends Coote against Hyder Ali, but makes no annexation. After him the Marquis of Wellesley crushes Hyder's son and annexes much territory; he begins to fight the Mahrattas, but the home government wish for peace and recall him. The Marquis of Hastings breaks finally the power of the Mahrattas, and more annexation follows. Once more there is a lull until we reach the Scinde and Sikh wars and the annexation of the Indus basin, 1843—9. It is difficult for an imperial race to stand still; in such a country as India generosity is regarded as weakness, and it is hardly too much to say that conquest has been forced upon the British in India in spite of the frequent swings of the pendulum towards peace.

Warren Hastings as the organizer of British rule in Bengal had no light task. Lord North's Regulating Act made him Governor General in 1773, but hampered him with a Council of four members, who could outvote him. One of the four, Philip Francis, stirred up natives against him. Suddenly a prominent Brahmin, Nuncomar, who was very bitter against Hastings, was accused of forgery, tried before Elijah Impey and three other judges, and hanged. There was a cry that Impey really murdered Nuncomar to save Hastings and to spite Francis; no serious historian believes this now, but those who only read the story in Macaulay's essay consider that Hastings' conduct was bad. In reality the charge brought against Nuncomar was true, he had a fair trial, and was hanged under the English law which Lord North's act transferred to India, and which Impey could not disregard.

Later Hastings had much trouble in raising money for his defensive wars against the Mahrattas and Mysoreans. He also had to send home much money to satisfy the shareholders of the Company. He was accused of persecuting native tributary chiefs in order to find the means. There was an opinion that all Englishmen in India cared for nothing but to enrich themselves; that many did make money none too honestly in those days is true; and so, though Hastings' own hands were clean, he had to bear the burden of others' misdeeds.

North and Fox opposed by the King. The Whigs who made the Treaty of Versailles in 1783 were not a united party, and there were quarrels and jealousies. In that year the ex-"King's Friend," Lord North, and the pro-American Fox, formed a coalition ministry. George always hated Fox, and considered that North was a traitor in joining him. They brought in an India Bill. Their design was to give complete control over India to the Commons, breaking down the power of the Company and disregarding the king. George was indignant, and used all his royal influence to get the Lords to reject the bill. It was a strange thing for any king to do; he would have been within his rights if he had vetoed the bill after it had passed both the Commons and the Lords. Then he dismissed both Fox and North. Having no one else to whom to apply, he called upon William Pitt, Lord Chatham's second son, then aged twenty-four, to form a ministry. Pitt accepted, and his father's old friends and the king's party rallied round him. People expected him to fail. He appealed to the country, and at a General Election secured a good majority; Fox and many of his supporters lost their seats, and were nicknamed "Fox's Martyrs" from the title of a celebrated book. Pitt remained in power for seventeen years, from December 1783 to January 1801. George supported him, and the nation both remembered his father and admired his own courage.

Young Pitt's ministry during peace. For nine years there was peace, followed by eight of storm and war, while Pitt was premier; the French Revolution divides the two periods. We may say that the nine years of peace were invaluable to England; they marked a wonderful recovery after the loss of the American colonies, and gave us resources to face the French Republic. It was a period when men were beginning to see that the conditions of life were changing. Machines were invented which superseded the old hand-loom; this meant that weavers would be unable to work in their own cottages, but have to settle in towns round the big factories where the machines were housed. James Watt perfected his steam-engine in 1785, the result was that the factories had to be near to the coal-fields. Canals were being constructed all over England for the easier conveyance of heavy goods and of coal, which now took the place of charcoal in the smelting of iron. The agricultural reforms which began in East Anglia in Lord Townshend's days were being generally accepted; scientific farming received a great impetus from the work of the Earl of Leicester, known as Coke of Norfolk. Of course these were but beginnings: reforms in farming are always introduced slowly. But, as the population was growing towards nine millions, a day was coming when the country would be unable to feed its mass of workers unless the reforms were widely spread. For these reasons the closing years of the 18th and the early years of the 19th century would have been full of excitement and change in any case, had there been no French Revolution.

The National Debt stood at about 250 millions. Pitt made arrangements to reduce it by one million every year. Unluckily at the same time the need for economy led to the usual result: the army was reduced to a dangerously low figure.

Most people used to think that gold alone made a man or nation rich. Adam Smith in his book The Wealth of Nations taught that anything which can be exchanged is wealth, and that gold is only a medium of exchange; therefore nations should trade with each other in their natural products. Pitt under his influence made a commercial treaty with France, by which French wines and brandy and silk could enter England freely, and English coal and cloth and ironware similarly enter France. If our gold went to pay for their wine, their gold would return to us to pay for our coal. This is Free Trade. Smuggling would of course decrease when the duties were reduced. The treaty was popular in South France where grow the grapes and mulberries, very unpopular in the North where miners and mechanics were thrown out of work because our minerals and manufactures were better and cheaper than theirs.

Another man who influenced Pitt was William Wilberforce, the hero of the anti-Slavery crusade. In a conversation under a tree near Pitt's home in Hayes Park, still called Wilberforce's tree, he first persuaded the young Premier to look into the iniquities of the slave-trade, and the result was the appointment of a Parliamentary Committee to investigate the question, Whitbread being chairman.

Various other movements, such as that for the Reform of Parliament by the abolition of the rotten boroughs, would have had Pitt's support. But George objected to some of his plans, and others had to be postponed because of the French Revolution.

A new India Bill was passed. The East India Company was to govern the annexed districts, and to manage the civil service and the trade; but the Commons were to choose a Board of Control to superintend the general policy; the king was to appoint the Governor General, whom his Council were no longer to have the right to overrule by their votes. Shortly afterwards Warren Hastings came home. There was such a strong feeling against all English officials employed in the government of India that he was at once attacked in the Commons. Edmund Burke, Charles James Fox, and Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the famous play-writer, were his chief enemies; Burke's strong imagination carried him away, and picturing a beautiful and romantic India ground down by greedy Englishmen he jumped to the conclusion that Hastings was the worst offender. As a Governor General could not be attacked in any other way, they proposed an impeachment. Pitt, to everybody's surprise, consented. He was jealous, so it was insinuated, lest Hastings should become as famous at home as in India; but the probable explanation is that he thought an impeachment the best method of calling public attention to India. Thus began the celebrated trial before the Lords, which lasted down to 1795. Hastings was finally acquitted, but he was ruined in fortune, nor did he ever enter into English political life: a sad end to a great career.

SECOND PERIOD

1789. FRENCH REVOLUTION. 1804. NAPOLEON EMPEROR.
1793. THE REPUBLIC DECLARES WAR ON GREAT BRITAIN.
1798. THE EGYPTIAN EXPEDITION.
1802. PEACE OF AMIENS.
1803. THE SECOND WAR BEGINS.
1805. TRAFALGAR.
1808. THE PENINSULAR WAR BEGINS.
1813. THE UPRISING OF EUROPE.
1815. WATERLOO.

We now approach the tremendous outbreak known as the French Revolution, after which raged a series of terrible wars terminated at last by Waterloo. This period cuts off the nineteenth century from preceding ages just like some deep chasm.

The causes need not delay us. The chief cause, indeed, was the great difference between the untaxed privileged French nobles and the tax-paying unprivileged people. But England had some share in bringing it about. Firstly, by joining the Americans against us Louis XVI piled up the extra load of debt which made him bankrupt, and it was because of his bankruptcy that he was forced to call the States General. Secondly, there had been much talk during our civil war amongst Cromwell's soldiers about "natural rights of men," and their ideas had been commonly held by the revolted Americans; the French soldiers who had helped the Americans spread the talk throughout France. The writings of Voltaire and Rousseau stirred up the minds of Frenchmen to regard liberty as a natural right.

"Rights of Man," "Liberty, Fraternity, Equality," became catch-words. Now the American war had been a victorious war for the French; Louis XVI had greatly improved both army and navy. Yet he gained from it nothing but empty glory and debt and his death by the guillotine.

The Revolution began by the meeting at Versailles of the States General, May, 1789. It was a meeting of three Chambers: Nobles, Clergy, and Tiers Etat or Commons. The British nation applauded. How sensible of the French to have a Parliament like ours! But ours is the slow growth of many centuries; theirs had been last summoned in 1614, and France had had in the interval no experience of self-government. In June the three Chambers were joined into one, called the National Assembly. In July there was a scare that Louis was going to use his soldiers to expel its members; an angry mob in Paris, searching for arms, attacked the great fortress, the Bastille, which corresponded to our Tower; it was surrendered July 14 by its garrison,

Fall of the Bastille, 14 July 1789

July 14. Peasants then rose and sacked castles all over France. The Assembly, partly through fright, partly in generous earnestness, abolished all the privileges of the nobles. The mob grew stronger, and on October 5 marched to Versailles, swarmed next day into the palace, and carried off the king and queen in triumph to Paris. The nobles fled; the Church was disestablished and its lands confiscated. Next year there was a bad season, and the people were too excited to farm properly.

British opinion on the Revolution. People here began to be frightened, and Burke wrote his famous Reflections on the French Revolution. He had stood up in past years for the Irish, for the Americans, and for the natives of India, against oppression; always for the weaker against the stronger. Now he denounced the Revolutionists, and championed the captive Louis and Marie Antoinette, the overthrown nobility and church; his love of the picturesque and the romantic sharpened his attack upon the howling mob of Paris. He foresaw utter lawlessness and bankruptcy in France, leading to such confusion that only a strong soldier could restore law and peace. Thus while knowing nothing of Napoleon he prophesied his rise. To the many republicans in Britain he argued: "Do not be misled by what is happening in France, do not throw away the experience of centuries, do not talk of confiscation and revolution here, but let us maintain our monarchy and church, our aristocracy and democracy, as they exist." Fox applauded the Revolution, and saw that the overthrow of old injustice and bad customs in France was a real gain. But most thinking Englishmen, fearing a similar outbreak of confiscation here, felt the influence of Burke's words. The French were, indeed, no longer copying us; when a clever long-headed Revolutionist, Mirabeau, presented to the National Assembly a book which explained the nature of our Parliament, the others mocked at it. "We are not Englishmen, and we want nothing English."

How the Revolution affected Pitt. Our Prime Minister was not a bitter anti-Revolutionist like Burke, nor a pro-Revolutionist like Fox. But he saw how the excitement was growing in France, and that there were many British republicans who sympathised. So he postponed reform till quieter days should come; Relief of Catholics, Reform of Parliament, Abolition of the Slave-Trade, had better not be brought forward just yet. The French in their keenness for the rights of man had abolished slavery in their colonies, and a fierce war had broken out between blacks and whites; therefore Pitt feared to touch our slave-trade in spite of Wilberforce's influence over him. Next he passed through Parliament strong laws against sedition and libel, lest wild talk might lead to revolution.

At this date occurred the affair of Nootka Sound. The Spaniards claimed all the Pacific coast of America by right of discovery; we claimed our right to settle in places which they had only discovered, but had never colonised. The dispute seems to be petty; yet in it was involved the question whether Canada should spread westwards to the Pacific, for Nootka Sound lies between Vancouver and the mainland of what we now know as British Columbia. It was settled in our favour.

Beginning of the Revolutionary wars. The Emperor was the first to fight Republican France for the sake of his imprisoned aunt Marie Antoinette. Prussia joined with him, but Prussia and Austria were very jealous of each other. In 1792 France went mad with the excitement of war. A new assembly met and was called the National Convention; it not only dethroned, but in January 1793 guillotined Louis XVI. A sort of crusade was preached in France against all crowned heads. The French armies invaded the Austrian Netherlands, Rhineland, Savoy, and Avignon: the career of conquest had begun. In Paris the Royalists, or those accused of being such, were guillotined under the Reign of Terror. Pierce civil war broke out in Brittany and La Vendée, and also along the Rhone; the Royalists were the "whites" and the Republicans the "blues," and it was a war to the death. Would Pitt throw Great Britain into the war to help the allies? He wished to keep out of it, in spite of Burke's insistence. Indeed, he had no casus belli. He could not declare war because France had executed her king, confiscated the lands of her nobles and churchmen, and declared a Republic. The seizure of the Netherlands concerned us, but the Rhine and Savoy did not. Yet the Republic as a crusading force, calling upon all nations to throw over their kings with French help, preaching republicanism at the bayonet's point, offering to land "50,000 caps of liberty" to aid their brethren the republicans of England, was too dangerous to be disregarded¹. Finally they, and not Pitt, settled the question by declaring war on us.

At first it appeared that the allies would win easily. The enthusiastic Republicans refused to submit to discipline, and their armies were rabbles. But, very soon the old trained soldiers of Louis XVI made their influence felt; discipline was re-learned, and when added to republican enthusiasm was irresistible. Young and energetic generals came to the front. Danton at Paris urged "no surrender," even though hundreds had to be sent to the guillotine. Carnot,—whose grandson M. Sadi Carnot was murdered while President of the Third Republic in 1894,—organized the French armies for victory. Not only Belgium, but Holland also and North Italy, were invaded.

Pitt fights France unsuccessfully. The British arms did very little to help the allies. Statesmen blamed generals, and generals blamed statesmen. The truth is that our army had been so cut down since the American war that we had no good troops available; such troops as there were Pitt, unable to understand the need of concentration as his father did, scattered in four directions, to the Netherlands, to the West Indies, to Brittany, and to Toulon. The Duke of York in the Netherlands was not a good general, but he had no chance. Yellow fever destroyed in the West Indies thousands who were badly wanted in Europe. The "whites" in Brittany received aid too late, were overpowered and cruelly massacred. Toulon, the great fortress and arsenal of the Mediterranean, was recaptured by the clever Corsican lieutenant of artillery "Napoleone Buonaparte." On the glorious First of June, 1794, Lord Howe beat the French fleet in the Atlantic; this was the one gleam of light. Republican equality had ruined naval discipline, which, once lost, cannot be restored in a moment, and had exiled or killed all the best French naval officers.

¹ Bright's History, vol. III. pp. 1166, 1167.

Holland and Spain against us. The worst years for Great Britain were 1796 and 1797. Prussia deserted the allies, Russia had never joined them, and both were intent upon seizing Poland. The Austrians were badly beaten by Bonaparte along the Po; his crowning victory at Rivoli is commemorated by a well-known street in Paris. Holland welcomed the French and gave them her fleet. Spain, whose king was cousin to the recently executed Louis, actually made alliance with the Republic that had executed him, so great still was Spanish hatred of England; the result was that our fleet had to evacuate the Mediterranean. Ireland was in a dangerous state, and might revolt at any moment if the Dutch and French fleets could unite and carry an army across the sea. There was no British army, for it had been frittered away in the West Indies. Our fleets were becoming mutinous; bad food, low pay, fiendishly severe discipline, were the lot of the men who defended our shores. Yet our fleets saved the country.

Let us take each in turn. In the south John Jervis was sent to command. His iron discipline prevented mutiny, and he certainly brought his fleet to a high pitch of excellence. Sailing from Lisbon he fell on the Spaniards off Cape St Vincent, on February 14, 1797; Nelson was second in command and by a quick movement in the heat of battle won the victory. The enemy retreated into Cadiz and never again showed a bowsprit outside; Jervis sailed into the Mediterranean.

The Channel fleet ought to have been blockading Brest; slack and verging on mutiny, it lay off Portsmouth. The French sailed out and reached Bantry Bay on the s.w. Irish coast in 1796; only rough weather and lack of seamanship prevented the landing of a veteran army under an able general, Lazare Hoche, and the mere thought of such a danger is terrifying. In 1797 occurred the Mutiny at Spithead. Old Lord Howe came down and promised redress, and the men returned to duty. But it was not till Jervis came home that the Channel fleet was made as good as the Mediterranean.

Lastly, there was the North Sea fleet whose duty was to blockade the Dutch ports. Mutiny broke out at the Nore, a far more dangerous mutiny, because the ringleaders were republican agitators who wanted to take the ships over to the enemy. Luckily the genuine sailors refused, and when their water and food ran short they gave in. Meanwhile Admiral Duncan had bluffed the Dutch by maintaining the blockade with only two ships, from which he made signals to an imaginary fleet out of sight of the land. When the men returned to duty he caught and beat the Dutch off Camperdown in October 1797.

Never has our country been in greater danger. The taxation was very heavy, for Pitt gave great sums to our Austrian allies.

“Who fears to talk of ninety-eight?” Ireland was in a dreadful state. French aid was expected; yet France had overthrown Catholicism, and most Irishmen were enthusiastic Catholics. The Protestants of Ulster were also ready for revolt. There was an independent Parliament still sitting in Dublin; it was thought that Pitt had promised complete Catholic emancipation, but he denied it. Without French help after the fiasco of Bantry Bay the Catholics and Republican Irish rose in 1798, but Ulster stood aloof. General Lake stormed the rebels' camp on Vinegar Hill, near Wexford, and the rising was crushed amidst great atrocities on both sides.

Then Pitt decided that the Catholics must be satisfied, but that first the Parliaments must be united. By much bribery Lord Castlereagh, who was Secretary of State, carried the Act of Union in 1800, and after eighteen years of existence Grattan's Parliament came to an end. Ireland was allotted 100 seats in the Commons at Westminster and 32 in the Lords. But when Pitt wanted to bring in Catholic relief George opposed him. The House of Hanover, he said, had been brought in as a Protestant dynasty to defend the faith. Therefore, as George was firm, Pitt had to give way. He considered that his honour was at stake, and so he resigned in 1801. This was the first serious disagreement between King and Prime Minister since 1783.

Bonaparte followed by Nelson to Egypt. The Austrians had made peace in 1797: only Britain and France remained in arms. In 1798 Bonaparte eluded Nelson and sailed to Egypt. What was his object? Certainly to make Egypt the French India. But what next? To proceed against India itself, or against Turkey? No one can say; he always had two strings to his bow, if not three. At any rate he sailed, seized en route Malta from the knights of St John, landed, and won the Battle of the Pyramids. Then Nelson followed on his track and sailed in on the French fleet as it lay in Aboukir Bay; he won his first crushing victory, which we call the Battle of the Nile, on August 1: he accounted for all the French ships but two, and these he caught afterwards.

If Bonaparte had really wanted to reach India, how could he have got there, even had there been no battle of the Nile, unless he had ships in the Red Sea? Yet his presence in Egypt threw Bombay into a flutter and encouraged Tippoo Sahib to defy us. But he could not march to India. So he turned in 1799 to Palestine and tried to take Acre.

•

Aboukir Bay: 1798 and 1801

The Turks, helped by Sydney Smith and the crews of two ships, resisted desperately, and plague broke out. He thus "missed his destiny," and retired to Egypt. Meanwhile Nelson blockaded Malta, which at last fell in 1800.

Europe in Bonaparte's absence · his return. When the French general and army were locked up in Egypt, Austria for the second time and Russia for the first time made war on France, backed up by Pitt's money. This was the Second Coalition. There was once more a British army, created out of the militia for the Irish war of 1798; Pitt sent it to Holland, where it captured the remains of the Dutch fleet, but then it returned. It ought to have been sent to the Mediterranean, where we had occupied Minorca, so as to support the Austrians and Russians who were re-conquering North Italy, in Bonaparte's absence it seemed as if the allies were going to turn the tables on France, but they quarrelled. Suddenly he slipped through the blockading ships from Alexandria, though he had to leave his army behind. He overthrew the French government, and made himself the military master of France under the title of First Consul.

Then he dashed across the Alps and in June 1800 won the Battle of Marengo, by which North Italy was conquered for France; in the following December Moreau, a republican general, won the Battle of Hohenlinden in Bavaria. Austria was thus once more humbled and made a treaty. The French power was firmly established over Belgium and Holland, Germany up to the Rhine, Switzerland, Savoy, North Italy. The Russians had withdrawn, and the Prussians had never joined the Second Coalition. Britain and France once more were face to face. In 1801 Pitt resigned, as we saw, on the Catholic question, and Addington became Prime Minister.

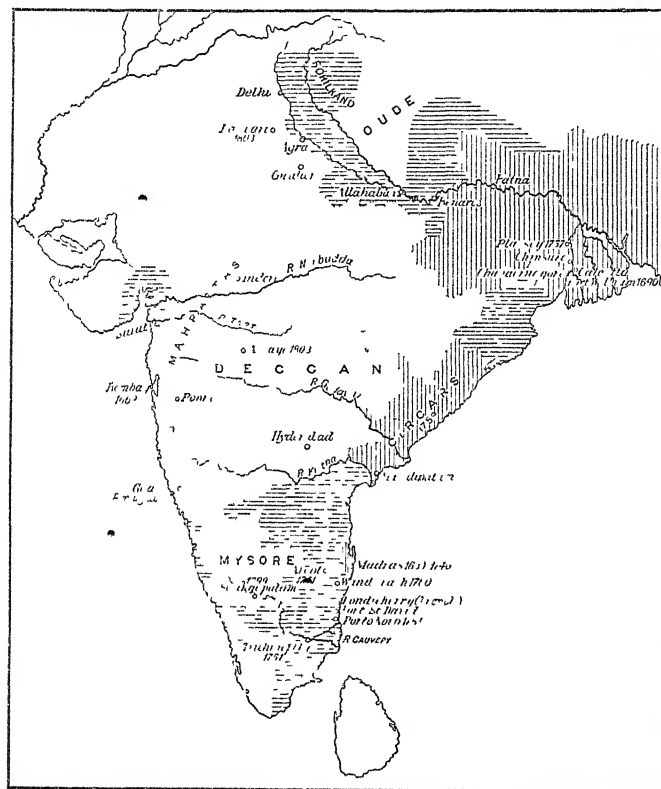

Wellesley in India Mysore and Mahrattas. The mere presence of Bonaparte in Egypt caused troubles in India. Tippoo Sahib was in arms against us and had to be crushed; he was a cruel tyrant and lacked the genius of his father Hyder Ali. The Governor General was Richard Wellesley, Lord Mornington, who started with a strong policy of making British influence supreme at the courts of native princes. A well planned expedition penetrated into the mountains of Mysore under General Harris; Serungapatam was stormed and Tippoo slain, 1799, Colonel Arthur Wellesley learning here many valuable lessons which afterwards helped him in the Peninsular War. Mysore was restored to the Hindoo dynasty that Hyder had displaced, it has since been the best governed of native states, and is the sanatorium of south India. A ring of land all round Mysore was annexed, as well as most of the Carnatic inland from Madras Mornington was now created Marquis Wellesley. He proceeded to make a "subsidiary" treaty with the chief of the Mahrattas, the Peshwa, whose capital was Poona; a subsidiary treaty is one by which a native prince puts himself into semi-dependence. This offended another strong Mahratta, Maharajah Sindia. War resulted, and Wellesley gave the command to his brother Arthur—undoubtedly a piece of favouritism, but one which gave to a good man a chance to show his worth while yet young. Arthur won a hard fought victory against the powerful Mahratta horse in the north-west corner of the Deccan at Assaye in 1803. Lord Lake, the conqueror in Ireland, beat Sindia's other army at Laswaree, not far from Delhi.

But there was yet a third Mahratta chief, Maharajah Holkar, who would not combine with Sindia, but fought us after his defeat. He held his own against Lake's officers by refusing a pitched battle. Still the British were gaining ground, conquered Delhi, and annexed the Doab between the Ganges and Jumna. But then came the swing of the pendulum. The East India Company and the Cabinet were frightened at the thought of so much annexation. Wellesley was recalled. Holkar was left half conquered, Sindia was restored. 'This is bad policy, for warlike princes must either be crushed or left alone; natives, especially the proud Mahrattas, consider such conduct to be weakness. So the "Great Pro-consul" returned home a disappointed man.

Gains at sea: Egypt and Copenhagen. Had we really gained anything by these years of war? Our Sea

India of Clive and Hastings

Annexations by Wellesley

Power had been restored to the standard of 1759. It had been utilised to effect some slight gains in the West Indies, not great enough to counterbalance the tremendous loss of life by yellow fever among the soldiers; it had won Trinidad from Spain, Guiana and the Cape and Ceylon from the Dutch, and Minorca once more and Malta. But our armies, frittered away by Pitt's inability to understand the need of concentration, had done nothing to help the main cause of the allies, namely, to curb the aggressive spirit of the Republic. It seemed as if we cared only to snap up outlying colonies and to let the burden of European war fall on Austria, helping her with money but not with men. Meanwhile it is clear what the Republic had gained; no longer fighting to spread republicanism in Europe, it aimed at conquest abroad, and after years of confusion and terror, anarchy and civil war, it had received the Corsican general as its master at home. We must not blind our eyes to what the Republic did; the conquered countries gained very much by the abolition of old evils and inequalities. But the French now looked upon themselves as conquerors, no longer as liberators. They plundered, and carried off to Paris treasures and works of art to fill the museum of the Louvre.

Peace was possible, and to secure peace on good terms Addington sent Ralph Abercromby to Egypt. We ought to put this general on a high pedestal. He had served continually since 1793 during the days when Pitt considered British soldiers to be worthless; he and John Moore were creating a new military spirit, while Arthur Wellesley was yet only a colonel in India. Now he got his chance. Combining admirably with the naval officers he landed 15,000 men in 1801 at Aboukir Bay, the scene of Nelson's triumph. The French, veterans of Rivoli, but home-sick and scattered between Alexandria and Cairo, were between 25,000 and 30,000; they were beaten piecemeal. Abercromby met the death and should receive the glory of Wolfe, a general cut down in the moment of victory. The French surrendered on condition of being shipped home to France.

Our Sea Power was so great that neutral states were offended, as in the American war Britain always claimed the right to search neutral ships for contraband of war, and since the naval victories of 1797 had closely blockaded French ports to the destruction of neutral trade. Russia, Sweden, and Denmark formed a league known as the Armed Neutrality. A fleet was at once sent in 1801 under Hyde Parker, with Nelson as second, against Copenhagen, Parker stood off, while Nelson took in the inshore squadron to bombard the Danish forts and ships. Then occurred the "blind eye" episode. Parker ran up a signal for retreat that Nelson might obey or not as he chose, being free to act on his own judgment; he made a jest of not seeing it by putting his telescope to his blind eye. The Danes gave in, and soon a new Tsar withdrew Russia from the confederacy against us.

Treaty of Amiens made and broken. Both countries were ready for peace, and the Treaty of Amiens was signed in March 1802. The British honourably restored all conquests in the East and West Indies to France. The First Consul did not object to our retaining Trinidad at the expense of his ally Spain, and Ceylon at the expense of the Dutch; but we restored the Cape. Bonaparte kept out of the treaty any words which would definitely bind him to abstain from further aggressions in Europe, he annexed more land in Italy, and had designs on the Adriatic and once more on Egypt. Addington had promised to surrender Malta and did surrender Minorca. But as Bonaparte's idea was only too clear,—just to get a breathing-space and to build up a new fleet so as to attack us again a few years' later,—Addington held on to Malta as a guarantee. Bonaparte denounced us, and the war was renewed in May 1803.

The years of the great blockade. Once more began grim and terrible war, which nothing but the complete exhaustion of one combatant or the other could terminate. Bonaparte wanted to finish it at once by an invasion of England. He created a vast camp of which the centre was at Boulogne, and the wings spread eastwards to Antwerp and westwards into Normandy. The preparations were so vast that much time was required; war material had to be brought up, transports and flat-bottomed boats to be built. Meanwhile he took the title of the Emperor Napoleon; he created a gay and glittering court, attracted many royalist exiles back to France, converted his generals into marshals and made them dukes and counts. But the preparations for

A Martello Tower. Many of these were built on the south coast 1803—1804; the name is taken from a tower in Corsica, captured in 1794 invasion never ceased. On our side a camp was formed at Hythe; the militia were trained with the regulars, and thousands of volunteers were raised. Plans for the defence of England in case Napoleon landed were suggested by General Dumouriez, a French exile.

John Jervis, Lord St Vincent, was at the head of the Admiralty under Addington. He posted a squadron in the Downs to watch Boulogne, while scores of frigates patrolled the Channel and protected trade. Admiral Cornwallis, brother of Lord Cornwallis, blockaded Brest with his base at Plymouth, and never once did he relax his grip from May 1803 onwards. Smaller squadrons watched Rochefort, and the Spanish ports of Ferrol and Cadiz. Nelson had the Mediterranean fleet and blockaded Toulon. Unless Napoleon's ships could break out, unite, and sweep the Channel, the Grande Armée could not cross the score of miles between Boulogne and Kent. We know from the experience of our swimmers how strong are the currents in the straits; therefore a surprise attack in row-boats was out of the question. Napoleon required absolute mastery of the Channel, and therefore the ships of Cornwallis and Nelson, though hundreds of miles away off Brest and Toulon, were the real defence of England.

Pitt was recalled to power in 1804. Austria and Russia were ready to take up arms in 1805, and the Third Coalition was formed. Would Napoleon dare to land in England, even if he could, and leave France open to the Austrians and Russians? In 1804 he would have dared, but the great blockade foiled him; in 1805, perhaps in the spring, he decided to make a feint of invasion of England and prepared to pounce on Austria.

But it was in 1805 that Admiral Villeneuve from Toulon at last broke the blockade. In April he got out and passed Gibraltar; the wind shifted and was dead against Nelson. Thus he crossed the Atlantic with a clear month's start. Nelson was not tricked, but pursued straight to the West Indies, thereby hustling him and gaining on him every day. The French sailed badly after being cooped up so long. Back came Villeneuve from the West Indies, back followed Nelson. Would Villeneuve attack Cornwallis and give the Brest fleet a chance to come out? His nerve failed him, and he turned to Spain. He met a third British fleet under Calder in July, fought a battle, and was headed into Vigo Bay, thence into Cadiz. Nelson, largely reinforced by Collingwood, followed and held him safe. Meanwhile Cornwallis hung on to Brest. Two things should be remembered in particular, Nelson's chase and Cornwallis' tenacity; between them they upset Villeneuve's plans.

What Napoleon would have done if Villeneuve had attacked Cornwallis and entered the Channel who can say? In August he considered that he had feinted long enough,

Plan of the Battle of Trafalgar: general line of attack based on the report presented to Parliament in 1913 broke up his Boulogne camp, marched his Grande Armée into Bavaria, caught the Austrians on the Danube before their Russian allies arrived, encircled them and made them capitulate at Ulm on October 20¹. There was no Eugene to lead the Austrians, no Marlborough to bring up the

¹ See p. 344.

British and other allies. So Napoleon crushed his enemy close to where Eugene and Marlborough had won their dazzling triumph in 1704.

All fear of invasion being over, Nelson and Collingwood watched Cadiz, and finally caught Villeneuve some miles west of Cape Trafalgar between Cadiz and Gibraltar on October 21. Sailing with the wind behind Collingwood threw his division upon the French and Spanish rear, and Nelson pierced their centre, while their van with the wind against them were for the time out of action. Of 33 ships no less than 22 were sunk or captured. It was the last battle fought on the waters which had seen the victories of Drake and Blake, of Boscawen and Rodney, and of Jervis; and it was the greatest. It cost Nelson his life, but he had done his work. Trafalgar did not save England from invasion, but coming at the end of the arduous and successful blockade was the final crushing blow two months after the invasion had been abandoned. Even so Quiberon Bay may be said to have caused the fall of Quebec, though fought two months after Quebec had fallen.

Napoleon pushed on after the victory of Ulm, entered Vienna, caught the Russians and the remnants of the Austrians at Austerlitz in Moravia, and annihilated them on December 2. So closed the wonderful year 1805. Next January Pitt died. Austerlitz killed Pitt, in the sense that he was unable to give himself time for rest amidst the strain of the war, and he died a victim to neglected gout.

The Ministry which succeeded Pitt. It is known as the Ministry of All the Talents. Grenville was Prime Minister, and many Whigs, excluded from power since 1783, were brought in, chief among them Charles James Fox. He had always been pro-American and pro-Republican, and had declared that, because they were republicans, it was wrong to fight the French. He was a man of great ideas, but spoilt his reputation by his fondness for drink and gambling, the two curses of the age; he had been the boon companion of the Prince of Wales. Now, when in office, he found out that it was Napoleon, not the British, who prevented peace; and he died the same year, knowing that the war was inevitable.

Before he died, he carried through the Commons a resolution against the Slave Trade. In 1807 it was finally abolished by an Act. When the planters were unable to buy negroes, they found it necessary to treat better the slaves they possessed. So slavery itself lost half its terrors. This policy of abolition merits our warmest praise.

But the war policy was still bad. In place of concentrating, to help the allies in Europe, a large force of the men who had been trained at Hythe, the ministry sent out several petty expeditions by sea. A small army won a victory in South Italy at Maida, but failed to save Naples from the French. The Cape was re-conquered from the Dutch, but a force sent to Buenos Aires failed disgracefully. The soldiers were being frittered away as before.

Napoleon at the height of his power. Prussia had not joined the allies in 1805, Napoleon dangling Hanover as a bait before the king's eyes. After Austerlitz there was no need to keep up any pretence; Prussia was goaded into war and lay prostrate after an utter rout at Jena in 1806. The conqueror ground her under an iron heel, and indeed treated her worse than any other country.

In 1807 he continued to fight the Russians. They expected aid from Britain, and that aid could easily have been sent. It never came, and Tsar Alexander made the Treaty of Tilsit with Napoleon.

This was the high-water mark of his glory. Belgium, Germany up the Rhine and even across the Rhine as far as the frontier of Denmark, Savoy, and North-west Italy, were incorporated with France; Holland had his brother Louis as king; North-east Italy was a kingdom under his stepson Eugene as Viceroy; his brother Joseph was king of Naples. His allies, Saxony, Bavaria, and Wurtemberg, were raised to the dignity of kingdoms;—his policy was the same as that of Louis XIV, to favour the smaller German states against the stronger, and thus to keep Germany disunited. These three, a new kingdom of Westphalia under his brother Jerome, and some German duchies, formed the Confederation of the Rhine. Poland was made a duchy. Spain was his ally. Now at last Russia was his ally, and at Tilsit agreed to put pressure upon Sweden, Denmark, and Portugal. Sicily, protected by our fleet, was never conquered.

Europe: chiefly to illustrate Napoleon's conquests

The Berlin Decree and Britain's reply. Unable to invade Britain, Napoleon set himself to ruin our trade. From Berlin he issued a decree that no British goods might enter a French port or any port under French influence. Here we see the importance of Tilsit; Russia accepted the decree and excluded our commerce, compelled Sweden to do the same, and threatened Denmark. George Canning was a young and keen minister, and he promptly sent both fleet and army, Arthur Wellesley commanding a division, to Copenhagen. The king of Denmark was asked to make alliance and hand over his fleet to Britain under trust. He refused. So to prevent Napoleon from seizing it the British attacked, took all the Danish ships, and destroyed the arsenal and stores. It was a sad necessity, but it made us very unpopular. Britain, it was argued, could send an overpowering force to coerce little Denmark when trade was threatened, or to seize the Cape from the Dutch, but never a man or a ship to help Prussia or Russia in their need.

The Continental system, as it is called, the beginnings of which were laid by the Berlin Decree, struck Britain very severely. Our forefathers felt the strain of this war far more than their forefathers felt the wars of Anne or George II, for two reasons. First, the new machinery, forcing our artisans from villages to new and growing towns near the coal and iron beds, greatly increased the output of goods; unless there was a speedy sale, men were thrown out of work and starved; the manufacturers had to sell great quantities of woollen and cotton goods, cutlery and hardware, or ruin faced them. Secondly, the population had increased till our island could scarcely feed it. Napoleon was entirely wise to shut out our goods; but he missed his second chance, for he encouraged the import of corn into Britain so as to draw away British gold to pay for it, and thus failed to starve us out.

Manufacturers and artisans were saved from the threatened ruin in various ways. There was a vast amount of smuggling, for cheap British cloth was wanted in Europe, and even Napoleon cheated himself by smuggling cloth for his soldiers' uniforms. Then by good luck came the revolt of the Spanish colonies of Central and South America, and British goods were largely bought by them. Parliament made great efforts to encourage landowners to grow more corn, allowing them to enclose waste and common lands.

Our government retaliated against Napoleon by issuing Orders in Council, by which it was declared that no neutral goods might enter French ports or ports under French influence. The ever strict naval blockade excluded all sea-borne commerce from France. No tobacco, raw cotton, sugar, or coffee, could enter French ports. The efforts of the French to make sugar from beet-root, which have been so successful in recent years, were then quite feeble. So, between Napoleon and the British, Europe suffered; but put the chief blame on Napoleon.

He did an immense amount of good to France. He arranged for the completion of a great code of laws; he gave her good order and government; he restored, in great part, the national position of the Catholic Church, though without allowing any political power to the Pope. Life was free, both in France and in the allied countries, far more free than under the old kings or electors or bishops or petty sovereigns. Old abuses were swept away, especially in Germany. But the result was that all goods were dear, whether English cloth or colonial sugar. And, again, a heavy price had to be paid in the shape of Conscription. Frenchmen, Italians, Swiss, Dutch, allied Germans, Poles, all alike had to serve in Napoleon's armies to fight his battles. Therefore the end of his domination was bound to come sooner or later, if only Britain could last out. Then two things happened; Spain from being his firm ally became his bitterest enemy; Russia wanted to re-open trade with Britain and defied him. The Peninsular war was the "running" sore which drained his strength, the Russian war was the knock-down blow which laid him prostrate.

Beginning of the Peninsular war. We can easily understand why Napoleon sent General Junot to occupy Portugal in 1807; he wanted to bring Britain's old ally under the Berlin Decree. His interference in Spain was senseless; he took advantage of a quarrel between the king and his son, compelled them both to lay aside their claims, and sent his own brother Joseph from Naples to be king of Spain; Naples he transferred to Murat, his brother-in-law, the famous general of cavalry. The Spaniards rose and actually forced a French army to capitulate, to contemporaries an utterly surprising, incomprehensible event. Moreover it was a genuine national rising, provoked by Napoleon's contemptuous treatment and by the French soldiers' greed for loot. The whole country was up, and Joseph fled from Madrid. Hitherto there had been a pretext that Germany and Italy had been invaded for the good of the Germans and Italians, in order that tyrannical governments might be upset and abuses swept away; now Spain gave the example of a people's war against Napoleon's military despotism.

In reply to a request for British aid stores and weapons were sent. Canning was delighted to help such a genuine national rising. But first it was obviously best to send an army to Portugal, so as to crush Junot when cut off from France by the whole of insurgent Spain. Not only was this country our old ally, but its situation helped us; our Sea Power enabled our armies to be landed when and where they were required, and, Lisbon once in our hands, they could advance up the river valleys; whereas from Cadiz they would have had to go across mountain ranges. The fact that we were helping both Portugal and Spain, distinct and rival nations, profoundly influenced the course of the war which had now begun.

The British soldiers now got their chance to prove their worth when well led. Abercromby had first shown the way in Egypt. The training at Hythe in 1803, 4, 5, in which Moore had a great share, had not been wasted. There was a better system of recruiting. Arthur Wellesley, "the Sepoy general," was just the man to utilise these advantages. The speciality of his tactics was the quick and steady fire of his two-deep line of infantry, which in his early battles he used for defence, but later in attack also. His character was marked by deliberate firmness in carrying out what he planned, but, when he saw his chance, he could strike a blow with startling quickness, if not with rashness.

First Campaigns in Portugal and Spain. In 1808 Wellesley landed in Portugal. With 18,000 men he repulsed Junot, who came out from Lisbon, at Vimero; then two senior generals stopped the pursuit. By the Convention of Cintra Junot agreed to evacuate Portugal on condition of being taken to France with his army in British ships. It appears to have been a sensible enough treaty seeing that the fruits of Wellesley's victory had been thrown away; had he been allowed to pursue, it would have been unnecessary. Lisbon was won without a further blow. But the British public was indignant, and all three generals were recalled, leaving Sir John Moore in command.

In the autumn of 1808 Napoleon in person burst like a hurricane into Spain, scattered the Spaniards, threw his left wing at Saragossa and his right at Burgos, and himself pushed on to Madrid and restored Joseph. Moore had orders to help the Spaniards, but found none to help. To give them time to rally, he marched towards Burgos and drew on Marshal Soult in this direction, and, behind Soult, Napoleon from Madrid. Then he turned and retreated to the north-west, Soult at his heels, and Ney at Soult's heels, for Napoleon himself had returned to France. After a bitter midwinter retreat he fought and repulsed Soult outside the port of Corunna, and himself was slain; the army was taken home to England. Moore had drawn two French armies into the poorest and bleakest part of Spain, and saved the south for fully a year. Could 25,000 have done more than this against 250,000? Canning had been enthusiastic when the Peninsular war began, but now was dejected at what he considered to be Moore's failure. But his fellow minister Castlereagh, whom we mentioned last as secretary in Ireland in 1800, was less despondent. It was by Castlereagh's influence that Wellesley was sent out once more. Not all of Spain and Portugal had been conquered by the French, and success was yet possible, if the British public would be patient.

Corunna had been fought in January 1809; Soult captured Oporto in March; Wellesley was back in Portugal in April with a new army, and in May crossed the river Douro in the most daring and clever manner and sent Soult flying in rout from Oporto with the loss of all his guns and stores. After this he turned south, then east up the Tagus, and in July repulsed Marshal Victor and Joseph Bonaparte at Talavera. But "Soult's reputation as a stout soldier was no wise diminished"; he rallied and came in behind Wellesley. With Victor in front and Soult in his rear, Wellesley slipped away and fell back to Portugal. He determined to secure the smaller country first and to save later the larger one; he could not help both at once, for, when the French concentrated, they were too strong for him. He was now created Lord Wellington.

The Peninsula to illustrate the reigns of Anne and George III

In 1809 also the Austrians made their fourth effort. They fought well, but were beaten at Wagram close to Vienna. To help them Castlereagh sent a strong force against Antwerp as a distraction. The army got no further than the island of Walcheren at the mouth of the Schelde, a low and unhealthy spot, where the men fell sick with ague and fevers. Castlereagh was quite right in trying to help the Austrians, but the place was badly chosen. Still he deserves all our praise for his determination to support Wellington. After the Walcheren failure he fought a duel with Canning, and both left the ministry.

Crisis: successful defence of Portugal. In 1810 Napoleon had no other enemy in the field and could pour his troops into Spain. He sent Marshal Massena, Duke of Rivoli and Prince of Essling (a village near Wagram), "to drive the leopards into the sea." Perceval, our Prime Minister, gave Wellington free choice to defend or to evacuate Portugal. Let us consider the position. Some 80,000 French were required to hold down the Spaniards, from San Sebastian on the French frontier, through Vittoria, Burgos, Valladolid, and Salamanca, to the Portuguese frontier; and even this number could not master the guerilla bands on their flanks. Massena had 65,000 for the invasion of Portugal. Soult with 70,000 was conquering Andalusia, and besieging Cadiz in vain. Joseph and other generals had other forces in the centre and east. The Spaniards raised army after army, were always beaten, and never gave in. Wellington had 50,000 British and trained Portuguese, and large bands of Portuguese militia for guerilla raids, and he was waiting for Massena, who took the whole summer to get ready.

In September Massena crossed the frontier. Wellington fell back, and on the ridge of Busaco concentrated his army and repulsed Massena with great loss. But still he fell back. The Portuguese devastated their own country, so as to starve out the French, while their militia closed in on the rear as Massena advanced. At last Wellington's plan was seen. Between the sea and the wide Tagus his engineers had been erecting the double lines of Torres Vedras, 25 miles in length. Massena halted as Wellington withdrew within the impregnable fortifications. He dared not assault, Soult from Andalusia made no effort to come to his aid till it was too late. So, after existing the whole winter on such supplies as he could raise, he at last retreated and by April 1811 re-crossed the frontier into Spain. The Portuguese suffered terribly but were saved. The French could show, for all their efforts, only two captured Spanish fortresses on the frontier, Ciudad Rodrigo on a tributary of the Douro which fell to Massena, and Badajoz on the Guadiana which fell to Soult.

In 1811 Wellington was not strong enough to follow up. Massena fought him for the last time near Rodrigo at Fuentes d' Onoro, and then was recalled by Napoleon in disgrace. Beresford managed with great difficulty to repulse Soult at Albuera near Badajoz, where a resolute charge by the fusiliers showed that British infantry could attack. But no great success was won.

Successful offensive into Spain. In 1812 Perceval was murdered, and Lord Liverpool became Prime Minister; Castlereagh returned to the ministry. The Tsar Alexander at last broke with Napoleon, no longer being able to endure the losses caused by the exclusion of British commerce from Russia. Napoleon was preparing his mighty army of 600,000 French and allies to invade Russia. Under these conditions Wellington opened the year with good hopes. His plan was to dash into Spain, while the French were scattered; for they had to scatter at intervals to avoid eating up all their provisions at one spot. He advanced in January on Rodrigo, battered in a breach, and stormed with the bayonet before Marmont, Massena's successor, could collect his troops. In March he attacked Badajoz, and stormed it, but with very great loss of life. Then, penetrating into Spain, he won over Marmont at Salamanca in July his first crushing victory. At once he entered Madrid. But the further he advanced from Portugal, the more difficult he found it to face the concentrated French; their northern armies rallied; Soult evacuated the south, joined Joseph, and threatened Madrid. So Wellington, in spite of his victories, retired to Portugal once more, recoiling that he might jump the better next year. He had gained a very great deal, for he had captured the two border fortresses and won prestige, besides freeing all southern Spain. Soult quarrelled with Joseph and left the country.

Meanwhile Napoleon invaded Russia with his Grande Armée of half a million. He lost thousands on the way, but entered Moscow. The Russians set fire to their own city; yet, even if there had been no fire, he would have had to retreat owing to dearth of victuals. The cold and the Cossacks made this retreat one of the most ghastly in all history. The great army was almost annihilated.

Final collapse in Spain and Germany. The triumph of the Russians was followed by the uprising of Prussia in 1813. Napoleon called up all his reserves and conscripts, and was holding out in Saxony. Meanwhile Wellington marched from Portugal by the line of Rodrigo, Salamanca, Valladolid, Burgos, so as to cut the line between Madrid and France, Joseph quitted Madrid for the last time. The lines of Wellington's advance and Joseph's retreat met at Vittoria in June 1813; the British swept all before them, destroyed Joseph's army, and took all his treasure and baggage. The Austrians now joined the Prussians and Russians. Hemmed in by three armies, Napoleon was overwhelmed in October at Leipzig.

Slowly Wellington crossed the frontier into the south of France; Soult, sent back to the place of danger, contested every inch of ground. Slowly the allies crossed the Rhine into eastern France, Napoleon fighting fiercely at bay. There could be but one end; he abdicated in April 1814. But the last battle of the war was fought between Wellington and Soult at Toulouse after the abdication.

The war seemed to be at an end. We may ask ourselves, "Did Spain and Portugal free themselves from Napoleon, or did Wellington save them?" The answer is that in spite of patriotism, enthusiasm, the constant raising of new armies as fast as the French beat the old ones, the constant harassing of the French communications, the cutting off of stragglers and messengers by guerilla bands, Spain might have been held in subjection by Napoleon for many years, had it not been for Wellington and his regular army. On the other hand Wellington's one army could not have driven 250,000 French out of the Peninsula, had not they been distracted by the desperate Spanish efforts. Add the jealousy which existed between the French Marshals, their contempt for Joseph, the absence of Napoleon himself except for one short period, and the extreme difficulty of feeding so many French soldiers; and you have the causes of Spain's deliverance. Take the battle of Salamanca: Wellington's victory freed the south of Spain at one blow by forcing Soult to evacuate it; but he had his opportunity to win at Salamanca because nearly the whole of Spain was in arms. Portugal was more directly saved by British help, and the Portuguese were trained to be good soldiers by Beresford and other British officers. Finally we may say that Spain and Portugal with the help of Britain, Russia by the heroism of her sons in 1812, and Germany by her uprising in 1813, all contributed to Napoleon's fall. To Britain belongs the honour of steady opposition to him when every other nation had been crushed or become his ally, and to Wellington belongs the highest honour.

War with the United States. From 1812 to 1814 we were engaged in an annoying war against the Americans. As a neutral state they had resented our exclusion of their commerce, especially their cotton and tobacco, from French ports, and declared war. They had very few ships; our navy was still large, but entirely engaged in the French blockade. Also all our money was wanted for Wellington and our European allies, and naval efficiency had declined since Trafalgar. When engaged in a struggle for life or death against Napoleon, our fathers felt very sorely that they should have to fight this new enemy. It was an unpleasant surprise when some of our frigates were captured in single-ship actions. But the victory of our "Shannon" over their "Chesapeake" off Boston could be set against these. On Napoleon's collapse many of Wellington's veterans were shipped off to America. Successes and defeats were very evenly balanced. We blockaded their coast and destroyed their commerce; but their privateers did us much damage. We repulsed an invasion of Canada, and were repulsed in a counter-attack by way of Lake Champlain. Our attack on Washington was entirely successful, and the government buildings there were destroyed, but our attempt on New Orleans was foiled with great loss. Much relief was felt when the mediation of the Tsar brought about peace by the Treaty of Ghent in 1814.

Campaign of the Hundred Days. A congress of the allies met at Vienna to settle the map of Europe. Louis XVIII was made King of France. Napoleon was left as ruler of Elba. He soon wearied however of his petty sovereignty and decided to aim at a recovery of his former power. He landed in France in March 1815. The soldiers welcomed him. Louis fled to Flanders.

It was a race against time. Would the allies collect enough men to crush him at once, or would he organize sooner than they? He rapidly mustered some 200,000 men, many of them being the prisoners who returned to France in 1814 from captivity in England or Germany or Russia. Wellington got together a British and German force in Belgium, but most of his veterans were yet in America; Blucher brought up some 100,000 Prussians who had been occupying the Rhineland; the Austrians and Russians were yet too far off. Wellington and Blücher were planning an advance into France, when Napoleon got ahead of them and crossed the frontier with 130,000 men on Thursday, June 15. Wellington concentrated towards Quatre Bras, where the road leading due south from Brussels crosses a road running west to east, while Blücher took up a position at Ligny on the latter road. Napoleon gave his left wing to Ney to attack Quatre Bras, but Ney was repulsed; with the right wing under Grouchy and the centre under his own command he drove in the Prussians at Ligny on Friday, June 16.

Duke of Wellington

On Saturday he took his centre to join Ney, and Wellington fell back to a position at Mont Saint Jean, on the high road, three miles south of Waterloo and thirteen from Brussels. The Prussians fell back by a parallel road to Wavre, while Grouchy was looking for them further eastwards. That afternoon and night rain fell in torrents.

Napoleon

On Sunday, June 18, Wellington had in line some 67,000 men, of whom only 24,000 were British and 17,000 Hanoverians; Napoleon had over 70,000 French, and a great superiority in guns. He attacked at mid-day over ground saturated with rain. His left was beaten back from the house and gardens of Hougomont, his right from the farm of La Haye Sainte and the slopes to the east. Could he keep up the attack? Troops were seen coming up from the north-east; were they Blucher's Prussians or Grouchy's French? Very slowly they came through rain-sodden lanes; they were the leading Prussian corps, and came into action on Napoleon's right flank about 4 o'clock, in such manner that he had to send most of his reserve to hold them off. Grouchy thought himself strictly bound by his orders to follow the main Prussian body to Wavre, and so did not march to the sound of the guns; indeed, had he tried to join Napoleon, he could hardly have arrived before sunset, considering the sodden condition of the country. The whole of the campaign depended on the question whether each of the armies had to traverse hard paved roads or muddy fields and lanes. Then Ney, to break Wellington's line before more Prussians appeared, launched forward his cavalry in waves, and the British and Hanoverians formed squares to meet them. Some dozen charges were repulsed; but about 6 o'clock La Haye Sainte was captured and French infantry effected a lodgement on the English side of the valley. Yet Wellington had an untouched reserve on his right, and Hougomont still was held. Now the second Prussian corps had arrived and was threatening Napoleon's right. He had only his Guard remaining, half to send against the Prussians, half against the British. About 7.30 the British Guard and Light Division repulsed the French Guard, and then began the counter-attack. The third Prussian corps poured in. The French, attacked in front and flank, collapsed. The Prussian cavalry took up the pursuit, and Napoleon barely escaped. It was a rout, not a defeat, due to the harmonious co-operation of Wellington and Blucher; neither can be said singly to have beaten Napoleon; they were partners in victory, as Marlborough and Eugene had been.

The allies marched on Paris. Napoleon fled and surrendered to the captain of the British ship "Bellerophon."

He was sent off to the island of St Helena in the Atlantic and kept there till his death.

Europe after Napoleon's downfall. Malta, the Cape, Ceylon, Mauritius, Trinidad, St Lucia, British Guiana, were the permanent fruits of this long war. We had a wonderfully strong position as the greatest power at sea, having almost all the carrying trade across the ocean, and we had saved our manufactures by resolute resistance to the Berlin Decree. But a great price had been paid. The National Debt had run up from 250 millions to over 840 millions. The Bank had suspended payments in gold, and a one-pound note was actually worth only 14s. 6d.

In Europe, the frontiers of France were fixed as they were in 1789. Belgium was given to the restored King of Holland, but revolted in 1830 and received as its king Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg. In Germany Prussia secured most of the middle Rhine, Westphalia, and parts of Saxony and Poland, George III was restored as King of Hanover; the Kings of Saxony, Bavaria, and Wurtemberg, remained in power, though they had been allies of Napoleon. Notice that the old-fashioned electorates disappeared, and no German bishops remained as independent princes. The Emperor was now Emperor of Austria, and received Lombardy and Venetia and a part of Poland. But Russia got the lion's share of Poland. The Pope got back the States of the Church; the King of Sardinia got back Savoy and Piedmont, with Genoa added; the King of Naples was restored. All these sovereigns wished to rule as despots just as if there had been no French Revolution, and there was much repression of popular liberty. The Emperor of Austria, the Tsar of Russia, the King of Prussia, and the restored Louis XVIII of France, formed a confederacy, popularly known as the Holy Alliance, to promote the rights of monarchs and crush revolts. Castlereagh refused to acknowledge this alliance, yet could do nothing to prevent it. "Shall we who struck the lion down, shall we pay the wolves homage?" It was terribly hard on those nations, especially Prussia, which had suffered so much from Napoleon and had risen to assert their national rights against him.

We had our troubles at home. The misery was great, and even if there had been no long French war and its attendant burden of crushing taxation, there would have been the same horrors. But the nation was waking up to the need of reform, and we know much about the misery because great men and women had already begun to work improvements; John Howard and Elizabeth Fry, for instance, had already fought against the evils of the loathsome crowded prisons. In country districts the labourers¹ had starvation wages and were forced to seek outdoor relief under the Poor Law. In the new thickly crowded manufacturing centres the artisans and their families lived in foul slums, and women and children worked in mills long hours for ridiculous pay; but soon the series of Factory Acts began to compel decent conditions for workers. The Criminal Laws imposed the penalty of death for many more or less trivial offences, being a survival from the days when sheep-stealing, for instance, was judged to be more serious than we now think. Riots occurred, and even peaceful popular meetings were suppressed; at Manchester a crowd was broken up with much bloodshed by a charge of yeomanry and cavalry. Parliament passed Six Acts against riots and sedition. In consequence largely of these occurrences Liverpool and Castlereagh were very unpopular. In 1820 died George III. He had been insane for some years. The Prince of Wales, a gambler and drunkard, had filled the place of his father, with the title of Prince Regent, but without the full kingly powers.

¹ See p. 363.

GEORGE IV, 1820—1830

CANNING AS FOREIGN SECRETARY.

BATTLE OF NAVARINO, 1827; CATHOLIC RELIEF, 1829.

The state of affairs seemed to be worse than ever when the new reign began. Discontent led to conspiracy. A gang of ruffians planned to murder the ministers, but luckily a traitor informed against them and they were overpowered by the Bow-Street runners in a house in Cato Street. The mob of London violently took up the cause of Queen Caroline, George IV's wife, whom he wished to divorce, and whom he refused to allow to be crowned with him. Then when Lord Castlereagh committed suicide in 1822 there was a howl of delight from his many enemies. Castlereagh had been a man of grit and determination during the Napoleonic wars, he had pinned his faith to Wellington and had ever advised the British nation to make the strongest efforts, however firmly seated Napoleon seemed to be. But this was forgotten. The people could see in him only the minister who suppressed free meetings by cavalry charges, and who stopped free speech by the Six Acts. So his death seemed to be a national gain. Canning returned to the ministry, after a dozen years of private life, as Foreign Secretary; Robert Peel became Home Secretary; and William Huskisson was President of the Board of Trade.

A new era of Reform and Prosperity. Let us see how in these ten years Great Britain entered on a career of brighter promise. And first we will take commercial prosperity. Good trade comes from good means of communication. We have already referred to the canals and to the improvement of the high roads during George III's reign. The great engineer Thomas Telford has left his mark in the high road from Shrewsbury along the coast of Wales to Bangor, in the Menai Suspension bridge, in the Caledonian canal and a network of roads in the Highlands; indeed the North of Scotland owes everything to him. But now John Loudon MacAdam appears on the scene:—

Old Toll House, Reigate Hill

his real name was MacGregor, but when that notorious clan of freebooters was outlawed one of them took the name of MacAdam. His invention enabled roads to be made very quickly and very cheaply of hard sharp-edged bits of granite which the traffic welds into a solid surface. On "macadamised" roads, whether main or cross, coaches and heavy carts could carry passengers and loads of coal or pig-iron where previously there were few facilities.

But the age of canals and good roads, curiously enough, only just precedes the age of railways. In this very same reign, in 1825, George Stephenson of Northumberland designed his steam-engine and drove it over the tram-line between Stockton-on-Tees and Darlington. In 1830 the Manchester-Liverpool line was opened. His son, Robert Stephenson, helped him to make the famous "Rocket" for this line. It was Robert also who later on made the high-level railway bridges at Newcastle and Berwick¹, and the

The Black Bull Inn, North Side of Holborn

Menai Tubular bridge. Do not confuse him with Robert Stevenson of Glasgow, who planned the Bell Rock light-house at this same date, whose three sons followed him as light-house experts, and whose grandson was the famous novelist.

Passing from practical to literary work we see during the next reign a young short-hand writer prowling about

¹ See p. 150.

London and educating himself to study human beings in the slums and evil places. Charles Dickens has given us a wonderful series of pictures of the England of our grandfathers and great-grandfathers, the England of picturesque old inns and four-horsed coaches, of pleasant country-life in farm and manor-house, but also of foul debtors' prisons and work-houses, of horrible poverty and drunkenness and crime. By painting his pictures strong he contributed very much to rouse public opinion and to get wrong redressed.

In the political world Mr Huskisson may be called a Tory reformer. He brought about the repeal of the old Navigation Acts, which were very good in the days of the Rump and Charles II, but which hampered trade by sea in the 19th century. He began the policy of admitting the raw materials of manufacture, the silk and cotton and wool, free of duty. He was unluckily killed at the opening ceremony of the new Manchester-Liverpool line. When the public began to have confidence in him, and in Peel and Canning, Cato Street conspiracies were not likely to be hatched.

The foreign policy of Canning. Castlereagh had not actively joined that league of European monarchs known as the Holy Alliance; yet had done nothing to oppose them. They were bent on crushing national popular movements. For instance, once an Austrian army marched on Naples, at another time a French army invaded Spain. But Canning from 1822 onwards actively opposed these powers who constantly interfered with their neighbours' liberties. He sent troops to Portugal to stop civil war. He acknowledged as independent powers the republics of South America, for the Spanish colonies had revolted against the King of Spain. Particularly he was anxious to help the Greeks against the Sultan of Turkey.

Telford's Menai Suspension Bridge

All that happens in the Balkan Peninsula we call the Eastern Question; in contrast to the affairs of China and Japan it is the Near Eastern Question. The Duke of Wellington was the first statesman who told Englishmen that we should resist any attempt of the Russians to gain power in the Mediterranean, and therefore should support the Mohammedan Turks; yet Russia had been our most hearty ally after 1812 against Napoleon, and Tsar Alexander had been enthusiastically greeted in London in 1814. The Duke, therefore, objected to our helping the Greeks for fear of our weakening the Turks. However, when Canning at last became Prime Minister in 1827,—Lord Liverpool having resigned after fifteen years in office,—the horrors of the war in Greece were so bad, and the Egyptian and Turkish combined forces were pushing the Greeks to such extremities, that interference by civilized powers was really necessary. The united fleets of England, France, and Russia, destroyed the Egyptian and Turkish ships in the bay of Navarino. But Canning was dead before this result of his policy was brought about.

Eddystone Lighthouse

In 1828 Wellington became Prime Minister and reversed

Navarino Bay

Canning's policy. He withdrew the British fleet, and called Navarino "an untoward event." The Russians, continuing the war by themselves, sent an army over the Danube, which forced a treaty on the Turks;⁶ Greece was freed, indeed, but Turkey was prostrate before Russia, and this was the very thing that Wellington had dreaded. Some 25 years later, just after Wellington's death, broke out the Crimean War as a sequel to this Greek war.

Policy of Catholic Relief at home. Canning's untimely death had upset his foreign policy. But at home his religious policy was successful. For a long time past the question of the rights of the Roman Catholics was in the air, but while George III lived nothing could be done. George IV was an utterly irreligious man, and therefore it was possible now to propose in Parliament a measure for religious equality if the king did not care one way or the other. In 1828 a young Whig, Lord John Russell, carried a bill to cancel the old Test Act and Corporation Act of Charles II. In 1829 the Catholic Relief Bill was passed. Wellington was a Tory of the Tories, and absolutely opposed to such a measure; yet it passed while he was Prime Minister. The reason was simple. Ireland was tremendously excited, in fact was on the verge of rebellion; Daniel O'Connell was at the head of a Catholic Association, and its members were in quite deadly earnest. The Duke openly said that he feared civil war more than anything else and would sacrifice his political views to avoid it. So he and Robert Peel gave way. Henceforward any Roman Catholic could sit in Parliament, and could hold office in army or navy or civil service, except the office of Lord Chancellor and of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The chief point to be noticed in this reign is that even in the Tory ranks there are reformers, men who recognise that coercion alone is not the main end of government. Whether we call the reformers Canningites or Peelites we have to acknowledge that they did a great deal for the country. To Sir Robert Peel belongs also the honour of having introduced laws by which death was no longer the only penalty for minor offences¹; this is the Reform of the Criminal Law.

¹ See p 441.

WILLIAM IV, 1830—1837

THE GREAT REFORM BILL PASSED, 1832.

George IV left no children. The second brother, Frederick Duke of York, the late commander-in-chief, was dead. The third was William, Duke of Clarence, who became the popular sailor-king, William IV, manly, simple, straight-forward. By one thing alone we remember his reign, the bitter struggle which attended the passing of the Reform Bill. An unpopular or tricky king would have made the crisis much worse.

The Whigs at last again in power. Let us look back a little. The reigns of George I and George II saw the Whig oligarchy in power under Walpole and Newcastle, after ten years of intrigue George III broke their power, and in 1770 began Lord North's dozen years of rule as the "King's Friend"; in 1782—3 the Whigs were back for a few months, made peace with France and the United States, and gave a free Parliament to Ireland; from December 1783 to January 1801 the younger Pitt was premier and a "King's Friend"; only for another few months in 1806—7, after Pitt's death succeeding the defeat of Austerlitz, were the Whigs in office. During the long Revolutionary and Napoleonic wars the spirit of the parties seemed to change. The Whigs were accused of being pro-Revolutionary and anti-English. Yet in 1807 they did one good thing; they abolished the Slave Trade. They stood up for Catholic Relief and Reform of Parliament in a way which shocked the "old Whigs," who followed after Edmund Burke and thought that nothing required change since the coming in 1688 of William III. They stood up for Freedom of Speech as against Lords Castlereagh and Liverpool. The argument of the Tories was that reform, new laws, free speech, mass meetings, only made Englishmen ready for anarchy and revolution as in France.

Revolution did break out in Paris in 1830. The Bourbon King, Charles X, fled. His distant cousin, Louis Philippe of the House of Orleans, was put on the throne; he was descended from the younger brother of Louis XIV, and his family was hated by the French royalists because they took the side of the mob in 1789.

Thus, when the first election of William's reign took place, one would have expected that fear of revolution in England would have given a large majority to the Tories as in previous days. But they were divided; out-and-out Tories were led by the Duke and Peel; half-and-half Tories, in favour of some reforms and not of others, were called Canningites. Consequently the Whigs got a majority. Lord Grey, who forty-five years ago, in 1785, was in favour of Reform of Parliament, became Prime Minister. Certainly the omens were bad. The discontented working men were burning ricks in the country and smashing machinery in the towns.

The excitement over the Reform Bill. The need for Parliamentary Reform was obvious; many large towns sent no members to the Commons, while small towns and villages sent two each. People saw that they could not get their grievances redressed, unless they had their own members to speak and vote for them in Parliament.

Lord John Russell, son of the sixth Duke of Bedford, was born in 1792. He had already in George IV's reign persuaded the Commons to disfranchise Grampound, a village in Cornwall much given to bribery, and to assign its two members to Yorkshire. In March 1831 he brought up the first Reform Bill. Over 600 members voted, and the Bill was carried by one vote. This was not enough, and Lord Grey dissolved Parliament soon afterwards.

There was a new election and the Whigs got a bigger majority. In July 1831 the Reform Bill was carried by 136 votes. Then in October the House of Lords threw it out. In some towns, especially in Bristol, very serious riots occurred; in London and Birmingham monster meetings were called. A young essay-writer, Thomas Babington

Election of M.P.'s for Westminster 1820

Macaulay, wrote to beg the king to put himself forward, as Richard II had done when Wat Tyler was killed, and to say "I myself will be your leader." But William hated violence and would not sanction mob rule.

A third time the Bill was carried in the Commons, in March 1832, by 116 votes; again the Lords threw it out. There was a dead-lock. Lord Grey resigned. William called upon the Duke to form a ministry, and Wellington found that he could not get his friends to join him. It was a national movement, not merely a question of mobs of criminals and loafers. Could the army be trusted? At any rate Wellington refused to be Prime Minister. Then the king asked Lord Grey to return, and he would create new peers to outvote the anti-Reform peers if they still opposed the Bill; the Tories had had their chance, he said, and must now give way or take the consequences. Once before a sovereign, Queen Anne, created a dozen peers to force the Treaty of Utrecht through the Lords. Now a threat was enough. The Reform Bill passed the Lords and became Law.

Some rotten boroughs lost both members, some lost only one. There were 143 seats to re-distribute; 65 were given to counties, 44 to twenty-two big towns, and 21 to twenty-one medium towns; 13 were apportioned to Scotland and Ireland. Both in counties and in towns many men received the right to vote who had not had it before. But at once it was seen that enough had not been done. In the towns which now had the right to send members to the Commons the power lay with the manufacturers and the middle classes; the working men gained nothing.

Laws passed by the new Parliament. There was at once a new election and the Whigs remained in power. In 1833 Lord Grey's government introduced a bill to abolish slavery in British colonies; a sum of £20,000,000 was given to compensate slave-owners. The slaves were freed gradually. Of course in the West Indies the expense of sugar was much increased, for free blacks work badly though they demand high wages.

Next came the Reform of the Poor Law which aimed at restricting the amount of "out-door relief" given alike to honest poor and to worthless paupers. Wages were terribly low, and many farm labourers could not live on what the farmers gave them; thus the whole country had to pay by means of "poor rate" what really the employers ought to pay. The new law seemed to be cruel, but was necessary.

The Municipal Reform Bill provided that all resident ratepayers should have votes at elections for town-councils. By this time Lord Grey had resigned, and Lord Melbourne was Prime Minister. His title comes from a little town in Derbyshire, and the big Australian city is named from him.

Abroad the most important event was the rebellion of the Roman Catholics of Belgium against the Protestant Dutch. It was a national revolt in the first place, but religious feelings made the struggle more bitter. Britain and France supported the Belgians, and they were successful. Leopold of Coburg, whose son Leopold II died recently, was chosen to be the first King of the Belgians, and the country has increased enormously in wealth and prosperity. About the same time the Russians suppressed with a heavy hand a revolt in Poland, a country too far away for British interference to be possible. Lord Palmerston, an Irish Peer who sat in the Commons, was Foreign Secretary and was strongly anti-Russian, but could not help Poland.

VICTORIA, 1837—1901

Difficult indeed it is to explain and appreciate the work of Queen Victoria during her reign of sixty-three and a half years. Her good taste and good personal influence were conspicuous throughout. The two "Jubilee" ceremonies of 1887 and 1897 proved her popularity and the nation's serious loyalty. At one time her husband, Albert the Prince Consort, was sneered at; but we know now that his influence too was all for good. No woman being able to rule in Hanover, her ~~uncle~~ became king there, and so the Hanoverian connection came to an end after 123 years.

Movement for Reform and Free Trade. The chief grievance was that the working men, in spite of the first Reform Bill, had no votes. Their idea was that as soon as ever they had votes for Parliament, they would be able to get their grievances redressed. There was drawn up what was called the People's Charter containing six points. They demanded that every man should have a vote, and that the voting districts should be of equal size; since then one cannot say these points have been granted, but they have almost been granted. They demanded a secret method of voting by ballot, and the right for any man to enter the Commons; these have been granted. Lastly they demanded annual Parliaments and payment of members; these never have been, and are not likely to be granted¹.

At the same time there was a great agitation in favour of taking off the tax upon the foreign corn. Richard Cobden and John Bright, both of them manufacturers from Lancashire, were at the head of the movement, and it was always thrown in their teeth that they wished to ruin the farmers of England, so that when bread was cheaper they might have an excuse to give lower wages to their workmen.

This is known as the Anti-Corn Law Movement and the headquarters were at Manchester. We find that at this period the landed classes and Tories generally opposed the Whigs and manufacturers very bitterly. They supported the Factory Acts and Truck Acts which compelled manufacturers to treat the workmen better, and especially the workwomen and children.

Lord Melbourne and the Whigs lost power, and a Tory Government came in under Sir Robert Peel. His name of course is chiefly remembered from the two nicknames given to the London policemen whom he first instituted. He was in power on purpose to maintain the tax on corn for the benefit of the landlords and farmers.

¹ Disraeli once said, "Never prophesy till you know."

While he was Prime Minister famine threatened in Ireland, and there were fears that a large proportion of the population would be in absolute danger of starvation. This broke down Peel's opposition to free trade in corn. Though himself brought to power on purpose to maintain the Corn Laws, it was he who proposed their repeal in 1846. The alternative perhaps would have been to have reduced the duty on corn to a small fixed sum, but this was not done. Peel brought in freedom of trade, and foreign corn could come in with merely a duty of one shilling per quarter. The Tories, representing the landlord and farming classes, considered themselves betrayed, but they had no spokesman to plead their cause. Suddenly a young man, who had been much laughed at when he first entered Parliament, got up and spoke on their behalf, giving to them the service of a clever tongue which they so greatly needed; this was Mr Benjamin Disraeli, who was henceforward the idol of the Tory, or, as they now came to be called, the Conservative party. But the prophecies of the ruin of agriculture were not immediately fulfilled. For the next 30 years English farming flourished simply because, having the foreign corn coming in and competing against theirs, the farmers had to put their minds to the work and farm scientifically.

Events in Africa and India. We must now go outside England. One of the chief results of the abolition of slavery was that the Dutch at the Cape, wishing to keep their slaves, trekked, i.e. marched off with their families and waggons, into the interior of Africa. Thus were founded the Boer Republics, the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. During these same years the English Government at the Cape had frequent troubles with the Kaffirs and several wars resulted. From India was conducted the most disastrous expedition of all our modern history. Owing to fear of Russian influence at Cabul an English expedition went up in 1839, and seemed at first to be quite successful. Several of the troops were withdrawn and a small garrison left at Cabul, when a rising of the fanatical Mohammedans of Afghanistan took place. Most unwisely the garrison made terms with their fierce enemies, and were on the march back to India when they were attacked and destroyed, not in the Khyber Pass itself, but in one of the passes between it and Cabul. An avenging force was immediately sent up under General Pollock which stormed the Khyber Pass, relieved a hard-pressed garrison at Jellalabad, and once more occupied Cabul, though it was finally withdrawn. The result of this war was that the Government were almost forced into the annexation of the country of the Lower Indus and the Punjab which had previously been independent. Sir Charles Napier, an old officer of the Peninsular War and an elder brother of the celebrated historian, conquered Scinde in 1843 by dint of very hard fighting. Lord Hardinge, another Peninsular man, conquered the Sikhs; a great battle was fought in 1846 at Sobraon on the river Sutlej. In 1848 the Second Sikh War broke out, and on this occasion Lord Dalhousie, then being Governor General, annexed the whole of the Punjab. Since those days some of our best Sepoys have been the Sikhs, and their services during the Indian Mutiny were invaluable. One of Hardinge's officers was Harry Smith, who when quite young had seen much work under Wellington and had married a Spanish lady whom he had saved at the storm of Badajoz; he afterwards was Governor at the Cape, and the town of Harrismith still bears his name, while his wife is commemorated in Ladysmith.

The year of Revolutions. In 1848 the whole of Europe was convulsed by revolution and civil war. In France was set up the Second Republic; in Italy there was a rising against the Austrians; and the Hungarians revolted in 1849. It was in this year in England that the Chartists seemed to be at their strongest, and there was such a fear of riot that special police were raised in London. The Chartists presented a monster petition to Parliament, but when it was found that a very large number of the names were fraudulent, and as the middle classes of the country were set very much against riot and revolution, the movement suddenly came to an end. A few years later in France the President of their Republic won over the army and had himself named Emperor as Napoleon III; there is no Napoleon II, that title being, as it were, reserved for the great Napoleon's son. The Italians were finally crushed, though Garibaldi held Rome against tremendous odds in a most heroic way. The Hungarians were put down at last by the Russians who came in as the allies of Austria.

Great Britain and France against Russia. We had in England what is known as the Coalition Government, composed partly of Whigs and partly of Peelites. Lord Aberdeen was Prime Minister, but the most energetic member of the Government was Lord Palmerston. Suddenly trouble arose in Turkey: Nicholas, the Tsar of Russia, younger brother of the Tsar who had been our ally against Napoleon I, declared that it was his right to protect the Christian subjects of Turkey, and expected that Great Britain would join with him, having previously been so friendly with his brother. But though the Russians had once been our friends, the story of the cruelties of which they had been guilty both in Poland and in Hungary put the British nation against them. At the same time Napoleon III evidently wished to prove that he was worthy of being his uncle's nephew; he could not bear such a name without being a great soldier. It seemed at first as if his ambition would be to avenge Waterloo, but he finally saw that he had a fine opportunity to interfere on behalf of Turkey and so avenge his uncle's disastrous retreat from Moscow. The British Government, chiefly influenced by Palmerston, found itself drifting into war against Russia as the ally of France. Then was first heard the phrase, Entente Cordiale. A mixed army of French and British were sent to the coast of the Black Sea and encamped at Varna. The Russian armies were already on the Danube, but they retreated. It was determined to seize Sebastopol and the Crimea as a guarantee that, if the French and British forces were withdrawn from Turkey, the Russians would not again go near the Danube.

So, in September 1854, the allied army landed in the Crimea about 60,000 strong. A battle was fought at the river Alma and the Allies pushed on to besiege Sebastopol. As a matter of fact there never was a siege in the regular sense of the term. Sebastopol lies upon an inlet from the sea and the Allies besieged the fortress on the southern bank, but it was joined by a bridge of boats to the northern bank during all the war. Soon an army of Russians came from the outside and attacked the rear of the British close to the port of Balaclava, and were repulsed with some difficulty; next a sortie from the fortress was repulsed, likewise with difficulty, and this is known as the battle of Inkerman. But the Tsar said that his two strongest generals were named January and February. In truth the winter was so frightfully severe that it seemed as if the siege would have to be abandoned. The armies endured terrible suffering, but it is always unfair to throw the blame upon the generals or even upon the home government. A nation which has enjoyed years of peace and economised unwisely can hardly expect stores and supplies to be produced at a moment's notice, and is itself to blame. But the excitement was such that Lord Aberdeen resigned, and Palmerston became Prime Minister in 1855. As the winter and spring passed away the French were reinforced much more quickly than the British. Throughout the summer there was a terrific bombardment and several assaults. At last, in September 1855, a fort called the

Delhi, The Palace and Lahore Gate

Malakoff was carried by the French, and then Sebastopol was evacuated. It may offend our pride, but it is a fact that should be known, that most of the work of the siege fell upon the French and that their soldiers very greatly outnumbered ours. At the end of the war about 125,000 French were in arms, 55,000 British, besides German mercenaries, Turks, and Italians when Victor Emanuel suddenly joined the allies. This was the first war in which muzzle-loading rifles were used by all the infantry, and the generals in the field were connected with Paris and London by telegraph. It was Sea Power alone which enabled the Allies to win in the long run, for by sea were brought both stores and reinforcements of men, whereas the Russians had to tramp every inch of the way upon foot, and it is said that out of every three of their soldiers two died of fatigue on the march. By the Treaty of Paris the Russians agreed not to re-fortify Sebastopol or to keep a fleet in the Black Sea.

One of the first results of the Crimean War was the Indian Mutiny. The conspirators who were at the root of the outbreak were persuaded that the British had been beaten in Russia and had no men to send to India. It is quite true that the delivery of cartridges greased with pigs' or cows' fat, to the Sepoys, was the cause of mutiny amongst the rank and file, but there were various other influences at work; for instance Oudh had been recently annexed, and the people of Oudh resented this very much. The area of the Mutiny is a square of about 300 miles each way, of which the diagonal is the river Jumna from Delhi to Allahabad. The first outbreak took place in May 1857 at Meerut, not far from Delhi. The British troops were concentrated on two sides. On one side the Mohammedan city Delhi was besieged, and, when it was found that the Punjab was loyal, reinforcements of Sikhs came down under a celebrated soldier, John Nicholson, and Delhi was stormed in September. On the other side Cawnpore was captured, and men and women and children massacred, but the Residency of Lucknow held out, the mutineers here were Hindoos. As fast as reinforcements arrived at Calcutta, some of them from Persia, others which were on their way out to China,

India in the 19th century and finally a strong force from home under Sir Colin Campbell, they were pushed up towards Cawnpore. Henry Havelock first captured Cawnpore, but was unable to advance to Lucknow; then Sir James Outram arrived, and the two between them fought their way through the streets of Lucknow to the relief of the Residency, but were unable to fight their way out again. At last Campbell with a much larger force effected the second relief of Lucknow in November, and carried off the whole garrison with women and children, but Havelock died just after the relief. During most of the next year a very large force of British and loyal natives, such as the Sikhs and Ghoorkas, was engaged in stamping out the embers of the great Mutiny. One result was that the East India Company was abolished, and Queen Victoria took over the whole of the government of India. Eighteen years later she took the title of Empress.

Twelve years of European Wars. As Lord Palmerston grew older he became less warlike; probably also he considered that Napoleon III was an uncertain ally. At any rate there was a series of great wars in Europe and America in which England took no share. In 1859 Napoleon, whose uncle had won his first victory in Italy over the Austrians, thought that it would add to his glory to try to do the same. He beat the Austrians and liberated Lombardy which was handed over to Victor Emanuel, King of Sardinia and Duke of Savoy; but then he suddenly made peace, and demanded the surrender of Savoy and Nice to France by way of reward. In 1866 the Prussians and Austrians fought each other to decide which should be the leading power in Germany. The Prussians, using breech-loading rifles for the first time, won a decisive victory at Sadowa in Bohemia. In 1870 Napoleon, jealous of the growing power of Prussia, was tricked by the Prussian minister, Prince Bismarck, into declaring war. After a series of crushing victories,—Napoleon being taken prisoner, and the Third Republic being formed yet refusing to yield to Prussia,—the Prussians and allied Germans marched on Paris, which they besieged and captured in January 1871. At Versailles, the headquarters of the German besieging army, King William of Prussia was saluted by the heads of the other German States—Bavaria, Saxony, Wurtemberg, Hesse and others—as German Emperor. Therefore it was by national war against France that the United German Empire was secured for the very first time in all history. Also step by step Victor Emanuel had been winning parts of Italy, until in 1870 he finally entered Rome and United Italy was at last a fact.

From 1862 to 1865 a most fearful civil war raged in America. It is known as the Slave War, but the Northerners of the United States did not really fight against the Southerners to compel them to release their slaves, it would be more true to say it was to prevent slave-owners from migrating into the middle States of the Mississippi taking their slaves with them. Britain was very nearly dragged into this war when the Northerners seized two of the Southern envoys who were on a British ship, but the men were released and war was averted. Finally, after a tremendous loss of life, the Southerners collapsed through sheer lack of numbers. In the meanwhile the Northern fleet had been so strong that it blockaded all the Southern ports and prevented the cotton from coming by sea to England. Men were thrown out of work in Lancashire by thousands; this is known as the Lancashire cotton famine.

Conservatives and Liberals alternately. As long as Lord Palmerston lived it was pretty clear that no reform was possible at home. He was a Whig by name, but he was very strongly opposed to any legislation that would increase the power of the people or democracy at home. After his death reform came with a rush. Two very striking men led the parties, and each was Prime Minister in turn. In 1867 Mr Benjamin Disraeli, though a Conservative, brought in the second Reform Bill, by which votes for Parliament were granted to a much wider class of men than before. Also he brought about the first confederation in our colonies when Upper and Lower Canada,

Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward's Island combined together to have a united government, this was the beginning of the Dominion of Canada which has since spread through the centre to British Columbia¹.

Gladstone came into power in 1868 and brought in a very large number of reforms: the abolition of purchase in the army; the institution of board-schools, the disestablishment of the Irish Church, vote by ballot.

Disraeli came back to power in 1874 and soon new troubles occurred in Turkey. There was a rising of the Christians of the Herzegovina, a province in the North of Turkey and adjoining the boundary of Austria. It was followed by a revolt in Bulgaria. There were stories of Christians massacred by Turks, and a very great deal of excitement was provoked in England when Gladstone seized this opportunity to attack bitterly Disraeli's Government. Disraeli now went up to the Lords as Earl of Beaconsfield. In 1877 Russia took up arms, and invaded Turkey on behalf of the Bulgarians and other Christians. After some very severe fighting, when at one time it seemed as if the Turks would be able to hold their own, the Russians, largely reinforced, broke down all resistance and poured over the Balkans until their vanguard came close to Constantinople. Public opinion in England began to change. In spite of the previous loud cry against the atrocities of the Turks, there was now a cry that the Russians should not be allowed to take Constantinople. It seems that Beaconsfield himself would have actually liked to make an alliance with the Turks, and troops were sent to Malta, but the Conservative party generally, though wishing to curb the power of Russia, was hardly prepared to fight as the ally of Turkey. Finally, under Beaconsfield's influence, a Congress of the great Powers of Europe was called to Berlin. He himself went over as the representative of Great Britain together with Lord Salisbury. It was decided that the Russians should withdraw from Turkish

A group of Sepoys. The three officers to the right in the bottom row are a Sikh, a Dogra, and a Pathan. Most of the men are Pathans (Mohammedans); the three with Chinese features are Ghoorikas (Hindoos by religion); the three with square beards brushed upwards are Sikhs territory, receiving for themselves only a piece of land south of the Caucasus, Roumania and Servia were to be created as independent kingdoms; Bulgaria was to be practically free, but nominally subject to the Sultan of Turkey; and Bosnia and Herzegovina should be under the control of the Austrians. It was considered a great triumph for Lord Beaconsfield that he had checked the Russian advance.

Almost at once, as if by way of revenge, the Russians began to enter into negotiations with the Amir of Afghanistan. A British expedition was at once sent up and occupied Cabul, then retired, leaving an envoy with a small escort of troops. Shortly afterwards the Afghans rose and massacred envoy and troops. A second expedition had to be sent, and it was now that the British nation at large first heard of General Roberts; he not only defended Cabul successfully against an overpowering attack of fanatic Afghans, but he also made a wonderful cross-march from Cabul to Candahar and put down a serious rising there also. But it was clear that we could not occupy the country permanently except by a very large garrison, and evacuation was ultimately carried out by Gladstone though there was much excited talk at the time against it. Since then there have been many little wars upon the north-western frontier, but Afghanistan itself has acted as what we call "a buffer state" between the British and the Russian Empires. The boundary of India has also been pushed, in Victoria's reign, to include Cashmere and Assam and Upper Burmah.

In the elections of 1880 Gladstone was returned to power, and the Irish question occupied all his attention. He brought in the Irish Land Bill by which fair rents for lands in Ireland were to be fixed by commissioners instead of by the landlords; but it did not satisfy the extreme party in Ireland which was led by Mr Parnell, and a period succeeded of riots and murders and refusals to pay rent until Home Rule should be granted; Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr Burke were murdered in open daylight in the Phoenix Park at Dublin. A Bill had to be carried through Parliament to curb the rights of free speech and meetings in Ireland, which is usually known as the Coercion Bill. Lord Beaconsfield died just as the Home Rule movement began. Gladstone's Government was also forced into a war in Egypt in 1882. A revolt of the Egyptian army under an outburst of Mohammedan fanaticism had to be suppressed by British troops. First, the forts of Alexandria were bombarded, but the Egyptians looted the town before a force could be landed. When the soldiers arrived under Wolseley they seized and saved the Suez Canal, beat the Egyptians at Tel-el-Kebir, and marched very rapidly on Cairo and saved it from the fate of Alexandria. Since then the British have governed Lower Egypt in the name of the native ruler, the Khedive, but for many years yet the Mohammedan power, under the so-called Prophet or Mahdi, was very strong in Upper Egypt and the Soudan. Gladstone sent out General Gordon to pacify the country which he knew very well, but the Mahdi roused the tribes and besieged him in Khartoum, captured the place and killed him in 1885 before the expedition under Wolseley, which was slowly and painfully moving up the Nile, could reach him. Afterwards the Anglo-Egyptian Government gradually advanced step by step towards the Soudan, but it was not till 1898 that Kitchener's expedition broke the power of the tribes finally and re-occupied Khartoum.

Palestine and Egypt to illustrate the reigns of Richard I, George III, and Victoria

There had been several wars in South Africa against the Kaffirs and other tribes, but a new power was forming, that of the Zulu kingdom, and the Zulus were extremely well trained and fierce fighters. The Dutch Republic of the Transvaal was greatly in debt and harassed by the Zulus, and during Disraeli's government had, by their own request, been taken into the British Empire. The Zulu War broke out in 1879. One party of the 24th regiment was cut to pieces by a vast swarm of savages, but another body held out at Rorke's Drift most heroically behind hastily thrown-up defences. Finally, at the battle of Ulundi, the Zulus were crushed by rifle fire and the great danger passed away. Next the Boers, no longer having fear of these tribes and their debts being cleared off, rose against the British rule and inflicted in 1881 severe defeats upon small forces of British troops at Laing's Nek and Majuba Hill in the corner of Natal where it runs up between the Transvaal and Zululand. It was always brought up against Gladstone that he made no serious attempt to put down the Boers and granted them almost complete independence at once. Therefore, when we put together the loss of Khartoum and the death of Gordon, the evacuation of Afghanistan, and the failure to avenge Majuba Hill, we can understand why shortly after the Conservatives enjoyed in their turn such a long reign of power. Then gold was discovered in the Transvaal and Englishmen flocked in to the mines. For many years there were bitter complaints of the unfair way in which the Boers treated the British who by their mining brought wealth to the Transvaal. Finally came the war of 1899.

The Cape

Of recent years the most important political event was Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, brought in to satisfy the Nationalist party of Ireland, but it was thrown out by the Lords. Various reforms have been carried since then by both parties. The Conservatives had a long spell of power at the end of the reign. There has been no European war since the Franco-German, but there have been many periods of disturbance and unrest when at any moment a war might have broken out. In the "ningties" the chief political combinations of Europe were the Triple Alliance of Germany with Austria and Italy, and the Dual Alliance of Russia and France. Perhaps it was the fact that Europe was divided into two camps, so to speak, that saved us from having trouble and it may be even war in 1899. The intense strain felt at the end of 1899 and in the early days of 1900, when the first troops sent out to Africa were checked by the Boers, and Ladysmith and Kimberley and Mafeking were being besieged, affected the sovereign as well as her people. The tide turned, Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener relieved Kimberley, and surrounded a force of Boers at Paardeberg; the army in Natal at last saved Ladysmith. But Queen Victoria was in failing health, and died early in 1901 before the war was finished.

Queen Victoria's Jubilee, 1897

EDWARD VII, 1901—1910

So soon after our national loss it seems impertinent to criticise what King Edward was or what he did. As Prince of Wales he was popular, but he carefully kept clear of politics as long as his mother lived. As King he soon made his mark, by his geniality towards the great mass of his subjects, by his tact in his dealings with his ministers, and by his clever handling of foreign policy.

After Lord Roberts came home the Boers were gradually reduced by the superior numbers brought against them by Lord Kitchener, and peace was declared before Edward was crowned in 1902. We look back at the war with mixed feelings, annoyance at the first failures, soreness at the bitter remarks made against us by foreign newspapers, pride in the loyalty of the colonies. Some people still sneer at what they call the incapacity of our soldiers, and point to the small numbers of the Boers; others dwell on the difficulties which faced an army of regulars, largely infantry, as opposed to an enemy trained to ride and shoot from boyhood, accustomed to the country and climate, and enjoying the advantage of not fighting in uniform. A nation which hands over its military duties to a comparatively small and badly paid standing army should blame itself if such an army is not victorious at once. The Transvaal and the Orange River Colony now form part of the Empire, and have quite recently been federated with Cape Colony and Natal. Hope should be our chief feeling now. Loyalty and self-government can exist together.

The "Victory" leaving Portsmouth, 12 September 1805

The Dominion of Canada, first established by Disraeli's Government in 1867, stretches to the Pacific. The various states of Australia have formed a Commonwealth. There is a Dominion of New Zealand. And now we have, lastly, a united South Africa. By federation we mean a combination of states or colonies, each of them governing itself for its own affairs, but having a joint government for common affairs such as trade and policy. The people of the Mother Country began to feel a genuine interest in the great colonies some 30 years ago, and the feeling which we call Imperialism was first shown when colonial troops came to the Queen's Jubilee in 1897. The problem now is to settle a plan of common defence. Great Britain has never grudged to spend blood and money for the cause of the colonies, and often has received but scanty thanks. The rising generation will have to decide whether all the expense of keeping army and navy is to fall on her entirely as in the past. The colonies have begun to take their share of the burden of war; what proportion shall they and Great Britain bear in the future?

The Boer war was still engaging our attention, when a serious rising in China called for interference. The legations at Pekin were attacked. All the European Great Powers, the United States, and Japan sent troops, and a united force cut its way into Pekin in time to save the white residents. But this affair, vastly important as it was because never before have so many nations combined together, was soon forgotten in the excitement of the Russian-Japanese war. We all knew that the power of Japan had grown in a wonderful way. Great Britain had an alliance with Japan, and the conditions were that if either was engaged in war against two powers at one time, then the aid of the other could be called in. But France did not actively support Russia, so there was no need for us to fight for Japan. Whether this alliance has been wise time alone can show. The Japanese, making a mighty effort and being close to the extreme east of Asia which was the theatre of the war, drove back the Russians, who had to bring troops thousands of miles by a single railway; they destroyed the Russian navy, and took Port Arthur with tremendous loss of life. But it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the unrest in India and in Egypt, which saddens us because our rule has been honest and beneficial in each country, has been caused largely by the fact that an eastern race has beaten a western.

H.M.S. "Dreadnought"

One political feature is very satisfactory. We have, not a definite alliance, but a good understanding, an entente cordiale, with France. In 1898, when Kitchener pushed to Khartoum, we were nearly dragged into war with France, for she had always been sore because of our occupation of Egypt; but in the twentieth century all this soreness has disappeared. For good feelings and comradeship between us and the French we have to thank the personal services of King Edward. But the German Empire is overpoweringly strong, and has been creating a great navy for the first time in all German history. It is idle to shut our eyes to the strength of Germany and her needs, for her population is growing too big for her land and she has but a few poor colonies, but it is weak-minded to be scared.

Another feature of the last 30 years has been commercial rivalry. From the first beginnings of steam-power and machinery for a very long time the British nation, possessing the best coal in Europe and having the first start, was far ahead of any other as a manufacturing power; lately many nations, in particular the Germans and the Americans, have been making great strides in their use of machinery and in their development of their national resources, their coal and iron and other minerals. Free trade, some people think, has not been of great benefit to Great Britain. Certainly it was very useful at first, but since Americans and Germans have been manufacturing goods as well as our own manufacturers and then sending them into our country where there is no duty, while our goods going into their country have to pay a heavy duty, it has caused a great deal of commercial distress. As regards corn and food in general, the British farmers did not feel the competition of foreign corn and meat until about 1880. Then prices came down with a rush, because vast quantities of grain were exported to us from the United States. The reason was that the middle States of the Upper Mississippi and Missouri, which were always suitable for corn growing, were in the "seventies" being rapidly covered with a network of railways by which the corn could be brought in great quantities and very cheaply to New York. Since then millions of acres of corn-land have been opened up in Canada, also in the Argentina, in Russia, and in India, so that only a mere fraction of the bread consumed in our country is made of home-grown wheat. In the "nineties" the farmers felt this very severely and much land went out of cultivation, but many saved themselves from ruin by converting their land into dairy farms and by other means, and in quite recent years corn-growing has been looking up again. On the other hand, of course, our uncertain climate prevents us from being sure of a good harvest at home, and in any case the island cannot provide enough food for the whole population. Free Trade, the people on the other side argue, is a necessity, partly because other nations having a market in England are not likely to quarrel with us, partly because home industries provide enough work and the low prices of imported goods place them within the reach of those who could not otherwise afford them. The problem of Tariff Reform or Free Trade has to be solved by each for himself.

Other problems for the future are compulsory service in the army, the need of even a greater navy than we now have, the possibility of raising a larger national revenue to meet the demands on the government for national education, old age pensions, insurance, and so on. Closer union with the Dominions, as they should now be called rather than Colonies, is a large subject and involves the further question of imperial defence, because the British navy by itself has almost more than it can do.

A writer of history need not preach Patriotism, but it is his duty to point out the harm done in the past by unreadiness and false economy in days of peace on the one side, and by panic when there are rumours of war on the other. A careful study of the careers of the two Pitts, for instance, is most instructive. Just as in the world of science the twentieth century has provided such marvels as aeroplanes, so in politics we already have the rise of Japan and a new phase of the Eastern Question. Thus the boys now reading history at school will find other surprises as they grow up, but the lessons of history will not have been wasted if they learn the value of readiness and calmness and the evil that can be done by bitter party abuse. Also by good manners and manliness, if they travel abroad, they can do much to make popular the name of England, which has certainly suffered much in the past from a foolish feeling of contempt for foreigners.

INDEX

- Aber, battle in N. Wales, 123
 Abercromby, Sir Ralph, 414, 418, 429
 Aberdeen, Lord, prime minister, 459
 Aberystwith, castle, 37 (map), 123
 Aboukir Bay, Egypt, 413-4 (plan), 418, 469 (map)
 Acre, sieges, 88, 414, 469 (map)
 Addington, prime minister, 415, 418-20
 Addison, Joseph, essayist, 352, 355
 Adrian IV (Nicholas Breakspear), 83
 Afghan wars, 458, 463 (map), 468
 Agincourt, battle in France, 163 (map), 177, 180
 Agreement of the People, 281
 Agricola, Roman governor, 6
 Agriculture, Saxon and Norman, 17-8, 25-6, 44-6 (illustr.); Tudor, 195, 215-6, modern, 362-3, 403, 427, 456-7, 479
 Aids, feudal, 56, 68, 81, 97
 Aix-la-Chapelle treaty, 370
 Albuera, battle in Spain, 431 (map), 433
 Alexander, Tsar, 424, 433, 440, 447
 Alexandria, Egypt, 415, 418, 469-70 (map)
 Almanza, battle in Spain, 348, 431 (map)
 Alnwick, in Northumberland, 65, 85, 133 (map)
 Amboyna, massacre at, 250, 260, 289-90
 Amiens, treaties; Henry III, 108, 163 (map), George II, 419
 Anglesey, 37 (map), 123-4, 128
 Anjou, county in France, 71, 76-7, 80, 94, 108, 163 (map)
 Anne, of Austria, 292, Boleyn, 203, 205-7, 211, 227; of Cleves, 211, Hyde, 300, 311; Princess, 321, 330, 337
 Anselm, archbishop, 65-6, 71
 Anson, admiral, 365, 369, 374
 Antwerp, port, held by Spaniards, 213, 231, 234, 346-7 (map), by Austrians, 353, by French, 425 (map), 432
 Appeals, Act in restraint of, 205
 Aquitaine, duchy in France, 79, 163 (map); see Gascony
 Architecture, Norman, 59, 65 (illustr.), Early English, 112-5 (illustr.); Perpendicular, 184, 186-9 (illustr.), 195, Tudor, 200-1, 244
 Arcot, siege in India, 372, 417 (map)
 Arlington, Lord, 309
 Armada, Spanish, 235-9
 Armed neutrality, 419
 Armies, see Fyrd, Knight Service, Militia, New Model; Medieval, 121-2, 132, 135-7, 155, 158, 177; Spanish, 202, 235, French, 302, 410, 428; Standing Army, 298, 319, 322, 344, 351, 378, 381, 438, 462, and under various battles and commanders Arms and armour; battle-axe, 30, 180, mail, 31, 53, 136; plate, 183; bow, 31, 84-5, 92, 132, 136, 180, crossbow, 88, 137; pike, 128, 132, 137, 269-71, 288; musket, 269-70, 287; flint-lock and bayonet, 342, 378, 429; rifle, 462, 464, cannon, 237, 278, cavalry, 269, 275, 342
 Arsuf, battle in Palestine, 89, 469 (map)
 Arthur, Prince, 94; 197, 203
 Articles, Six, 210, 219, Thirty-nine, 225
 Ashley, see Shaftesbury
 Asiento, treaty, 354, 360
 Assaye, battle in India, 416-7 (map)

- Assize, 74, 82, 116-7, 319
 Association, 234, 334
 Athelney, in Somerset, 5 (map), 20
 (illustr.), 21, 318
 Athelstan, 23-4
 Athlone, in Ireland, 328-9 (map)
 Attainder, Acts of, 211, 264, 357
 Aughrim, battle in Ireland, 328-9
 (map)
 Augustine, Saint, 16
 Austerlitz, battle in Austria, 344,
 423, 425 (map)
 Austria, Henry VII, 196, James I,
 249; William III, 301 (pedigree),
 332-3, 336, Anne, 343, 353,
 George II, 365, 374, George III,
 409-34, 440, Victoria, 458, 464,
 468
 Avignon, on Rhone, 161, 409

 Bacon, Roger, 114; Francis, 245, 253
 Badajoz, siege in Spain, 431 (map), 433
 Badbury Rings, 5 (map), 14
 Balance of Power, 203, 212, 232,
 293, 353
 Balliol, John, 119, 126-9; Edward,
 151
 Bank of England, 332, 440
 Bannockburn, battle, 133 (map), 145
 Bantry Bay, in Ireland, 329 (map), 412
 Barbados, in W. Indies, 251, 397
 (map)
 Barcelona, siege in Spain, 345, 431
 (map)
 Barnet, battle near London, 190
 Baronage, 49, 68-9, 80, 93, 99,
 107-8, 117, 130, 142, 147, 189,
 194
 Barrier fortresses, 347 (map), 349, 353
 Bastille, 407 (illustr.)
 Bath, 5 (map), 8
 Bavaria, 332, 342-4 (map), 366,
 422, 424, 440
 Bayeux, in Normandy, 33 (illustr.),
 34, 36-7 (map), 63
 Beachy Head, naval battle, 277
 (map), 328
 Beauforts, 188, 192, 196
 Berumaris, castle in Wales, 37
 (map), 128, 138
 Becket, Thomas, 80, 82-3
 Bedford, 5 (map), 22, 103, 300, 311,
 Dukes of, 181-3, 325, 363, 385
 Bek, Antony, 134, 135
 Belgium, 231, see Leopold and Netherlands
 Bellême, Robert of, 69-70
 Benevolences, 190
 Bengal, 380, 400, 417 (map)
 Beresford, Marshal, 433, 435
 Berlin Congress, 466, Decree, 426, 440
 Bertrand du Guesclin, 164
 Berwick, 129, 133 (map), 147, 150-4
 (illustr.), 218, 286, Duke of, 348
 Bible, 164, 247
 Bigot, Roger, 130, 135
 Bishops, 58, 63, 71, 97, 117, 207,
 225, 246, 262, 265, 320
 Black Death, 160
 Black Hole, 380
 Black Prince, 155, 157, 161-5
 Blake, Admiral, 288-9, 292-3, 377, 423
 Blanchetaque, ford over Somme,
 156, 177
 Blenheim, battle in Bavaria, 344
 Blücher, Prussian Marshal, 436
 Boadicea, Queen, 6
 Board of Control, 404
 Boers, 457, 471-4
 Bohemia, 160, 171, 249
 Bolingbroke, Henry St John,
 Viscount, 352-4, 357, 362, 383
 Bombay, 300, 417 (map)
 Bonner, Bishop, 220, 223
 Boroughbridge, battle in Yorks,
 133 (map), 136, 147
 Boroughs, 25, 109, 117-8, 242,
 356, 404, 451-3
 Boscawen, Admiral, 376-7, 423
 Boston, Lincs, 37 (map), 141, 168,
 United States, 389-93 (map), 436
 Bosworth, battle, 192, 277 (map)
 Bothwell, Lord, 229, bridge, 314
 Boulogne, Counts of, 39, 76;
 French port, 4, 37 (map), 212,
 221, 376, 420-2, 425 (map)
 Bourbons, 301 (pedigree); see under Henry IV, Louis, Philip V

- Bouvines, battle in N. France, 97
 Boyne, battle in Ireland, 327, 329 (map)
 Braddock, General, 374
 Brandenburg, 332, 343; see Prussia
 Brazil, 213
 Bréauté, Falkes de, 101, 103
 Breda, in Holland, treaty, 297, 305, 347 (map)
 Brémule, battle in Normandy, 70
 Brest, French port, 335, 376, 412, 420, 425 (map)
 Brétigny, in France, treaty, 162-4 (map)
 Bridgewater, Somerset, 277 (map), 318
 Bright, John, 456
 Brill, Dutch port, 230, 346 (map)
 Bristol, 141, 168, 268, 271, 278, 452
 Brittany, 31, 155, 410-1
 Bruce, Robert, 126, 134-5, 143-7, 151-2; David, 151, 158
 Brunanburgh, battle in S. Scotland, 5 (map), 23
 Brunswick, 97, 376
 Brussels, 231, 346-7 (map), 437-8
 Buccaneers, 233, 251, 364
 Buckingham, Dukes of, 192, 253-7, 292, 309
 Buenos Aires, in S. America, 424
 Builth, castle in Wales, 37 (map), 123-4 (illustr.)
 Bunker's Hill, battle in America, 390-1
 Bunyan, John, 300, 311, 316
 Burgh, in Cumberland, 133 (map), 135; Hubert de, 101, 103
 Burgoyne, Sir John, 392
 Burgundy, Dukes of, 178-9, 181-3, 191, 196, 202
 Burke, Edmund, 93, 119, 322, 362, 385, 388, 404, 408, 451
 Burleigh, Lord, see Cecil
 Busaco, battle in Portugal, 431-2 (map)
 Bute, Lord, 384-5
 Byng, Admirals, 359, 374
 Cabal, ministry, 309
 Cabinet, 309, 361, 386
 Cade, Jack, 185
 Cadiz, 213, 236, 255, 412, 421, 429, 431-2 (map)
 Caer Caradoc, battle, 4
 Caerleon, Roman station in S. Wales, 5 (map), 8-9
 Caernarvon, castle in N. Wales, 37 (map), 124, 138
 Caerphilly, castle in S. Wales, 37 (map), 123, 138
 Caesar, Julius, 4
 Calais, 158, 163 (map), 183, 224, 237
 Calcutta, 335, 380, 417 (map)
 Calder, Sir Robert, admiral, 421
 Calvin, 221, 226, see Presbyterians
 Cambridge, 111, 141, 184 (illustr.), 187, 196, 204, 263, Earl of, 177, 187
 Campbell, 278, 326, 367, Sir Colin, 463-4
 Camperdown, battle off Holland, 412, 425 (map)
 Canada, 373, 377-84, 390, 398, 409, 436, 465-6, 476
 Canals, 403
 Canning, George, statesman, 426, 428, 430, 446-8
 Canterbury, 5 (map), 16, 83, 95, 166-9 (illustr.)
 Canute, 27, 30, 127
 Cape of Good Hope, 213, 418-9, 424, 440, 457, 471
 Carlisle, 65, 133 (map), 147, 368
 Carolinas, colony, 300, 393 (map), 395
 Caroline, Queen, 364; Princess, 442
 Carteret, Lord, statesman, 361, 365-6, 375
 Castlereagh, Lord, statesman, 413, 430-3, 440, 442, 446
 Castles, 54, 78-9, 138, 244, 273, 278, illustr., 55, 91, 102, 122, 124-5, 209
 Catalonia, in Spain, 345-6, 353
 Cato Street, 442
 Catharine, of Aragon, 197-8, 202-5; Howard, 211; of Medicis, 229-32; of Portugal, 300
 Cawnpore, 462-3 (map)
 Cecil, William, Lord Burleigh, 227, 232, 243; Robert, 247
 Celibacy of clergy, 58, 211
 Ceylon, 418-9, 440

- Chalgrove Field, in Oxon, 271, 277 (map)
- Chaluz, in France, 92
- Chandos, Sir John, 162, 164
- Channel Islands, 43, 94
- Charles, of Austria, 300, 336, 353, 365; of Burgundy, 191, 202; of France, V, 164; VI, 175, VII, 182; IX, 229; of Spain, I, 202-4; II, 300, 336; of Sweden, 341, 359
- Charters, Henry I, 68; Magna Carta, 93, 101, 104, 109, 131, 134, 256, People's, 455, 459
- Château Gaillard, Normandy, 37 (map), 91 (illustr.), 92, 94-5
- Chatham, 305-6 (illustr.); see Pitt
- Châtillon, battle in France, 163 (map), 183
- Chaucer, Geoffrey, 50, 83, 166
- Chepstow, in S. Wales, 37 (map), 65, 84, 122 (illustr.), 123, 130, 138
- Cherbourg, French port, 163 (map), 376
- Chester, 5 (map), 8-10, 15, 37 (map), 51, 101, 103, 105, 111, 118, 122, 171, 214
- Christ Church, Hants, 65; Oxford, 200
- Christian IV, of Denmark, 255-6
- Christianity, conversion to, 16-7, 22, 27
- Church, Irish and Roman, 16, 84; William I, 58; William II, 66; Henry I, 71; Henry II, 83-4; John, 95, 97; Henry III, 104, 114; Edward I, 117, 130; Edward III, 162, 164, Henry IV, 173-4; Henry VIII, 205; Edward VI, 219-22; Mary, 223; Elizabeth, 225-6; James I, 246, Charles I, 254, 260, 265, Charles II, 299, 311, James II, 320; William III, 325, Anne, 351, 354; Georges, 371, 449
- Churches and cathedrals; see list of illustrations
- Cinque Ports, 37 (map), 95, 101, 123, 139-41 (map)
- Cintra, convention in Portugal, 429
- Cistercian monasteries, 71-4 (illustr.), 207-8
- Ciudad Rodrigo, siege in Spain, 431 (map), 433
- Clare, 37 (map), 39, 56, 84, 105, see Gloucester
- Clarence, Dukes of, 187, 190, 223
- Clarendon, Constitutions of, 82-3, Code, 299, 311; see Hyde
- Claverhouse, John Graham, 314, 326, 368
- Clifford, 56, 309, 311
- Clinton, Harry, 395
- Clive, Robert, 351, 372, 380, 400
- Coal, 403, 426, 433
- Coalition, Ministries, 402, 459; against Napoleon, 409, 415, 421
- Cobden, Richard, 456
- Coke, agricultural reformer, 363, 403
- Colbert, French minister, 302, 330
- Colchester, 4-6 (map), 10, 54, 282
- Coldstream, ford over Tweed, 133 (map), 199, 295
- Coligny, French admiral, 228, 230
- Collingwood, Admiral, 421-2
- Colonial expansion, 251, 261-2, 292, 300, 302, 335, 351, 353-4, 361, 373, 384, 388-9, 440
- Commons, House of, 99, 117, 147, 165, 174, 242, 252-3, 263-6, 324-5, 356, 402, 451
- Commonwealths, 476
- Confederation of the Rhine, 426
- Conservatives, 457, 465
- Continental system, 426
- Conventicle Act, 299, 325
- Conway, castle in N. Wales, 37 (map), 123-5, 128, 138
- Coote, Sir Eyre, 380, 396, 400
- Cope, John, 368
- Copenhagen, sieges, 419, 426
- Corfe, castle in Dorset, 37 (map), 54, 138
- Cornwallis, Admiral, 377, 420-1, General, 396
- Corporations Act, 299, 325, 449
- Corunna, battle in N.W. Spain, 430-1 (map)
- Council, King's, 62, 68, 97, 108, 117, 191, 218, of the North, and of Wales, 215, 264
- Courts, Clerical, 58, 83, 205, 260, 264; King's, 47, 74, 81-2, 194, 260, 264; Manorial, 46-7, 82

- Covenant and Covenanters, 262, 272, 278-9, 285, 313-4
 Cranmer, Archbishop, 204-5, 211, 223-4
 Crecy, battle in N. France, 155-8, 163 (map), 177
 Crimean war, 460, 462
 Cromwell, Henry, 287, 295, Oliver, 260, 263, 270-94, 334, 341-2, 351; Richard, 295, Thomas, 204, 207-11, 264
 Crusades, 66-7, 86-90, 111, 172
 Culloden, battle in Scotland, 369
 Cumberland, 38, 65, 120, Duke of, 367-9
 Customs, 120, 252, 255, 257, 343, 403, 446, 456
 Dalhousie, Lord, governor-general, 458
 Damme, battle off Flanders, 95, 155
 Danby, Lord, statesman, 311, 325, 334
 Danegeld, tax, 27-8, 43, 56, 63, 69, 80
 Danes, 17-28, 30, 35, 84
 Darien scheme, 335
 Darnley, Lord, 229
 Dartmouth, in Devon, 37 (map), 141, 168, 232
 David, of Scotland, 77; 126, 151, 158; of Wales, 119, 123-4
 Deccan, 372, 417 (map)
 Declaration of Independence, 391; of Indulgence, 311, 320, of Rights, 322, 324
 Defoe, Daniel, writer, 336, 348, 352, 354
 Delhi, 250, 416-7 (map), 461-3 (illustr. and map)
 Demesne land, 39-44
 Denmark, 27, 254-5, 419, 424, 426
 Derby, 20, 122, 368, Earls of, 111, 142, 172, 175 (pedigree)
 Despencer, Lords, 147-8
 Dettingen, battle in Germany, 366, 425 (map)
 Diarmid or Dermot, of Ieinster, 84
 Dickens, Charles, 399, 445
 Dispensing Power, 319, 322, 324
 Disraeli, Lord Beaconsfield, prime minister, 457, 465-6, 476
 Divine Right of Kings, 227, 246, 254, 320, 322
 Domesday Book, 36-44 (illustr.), 49
 Dorchester, Dorset, 2, 8, 9 (illustr.)
 Douglas, 145, 151, 174
 Dover, 35, 37 (map), 101-2 (illustr.), 139-41, 230, 253, 297, 310, 317
 Drake, Sir Francis, 232-41, 377, 423
 Drogheda, siege in Ireland, 284-5, 329 (map)
 Dryden, John, poet, 309, 316
 Dual Alliance, 472
 Dublin, 215, 262, 327-9 (map), 400, 412, 470
 Dudleys, 220, 223, 228
 Dunbar, siege and battles in Scotland, 129, 133 (map), 218, 286, 368
 Duncan, Admiral, 412
 Dunkirk, in Flanders, 293, 298, 300, 347 (map)
 Dunstable, in Beds, 103, 205, 277 (map)
 Dunstan, Abbot, 24
 Duplex, French governor, 369, 372-3
 Dupplin Moor, battle near Perth, 151
 Duquesne, fort in America, 373, 377, 393 (map)
 Durham, 38, 51, 64-5 (illustr.), 118, 134, 158, 161
 Earldoms, 28-9, 36, 39, 51
 East India Company, 250, 300, 361, 369, 388, 401, 404, 416, 464
 Eastern Counties' Association, 272-6
 Eastern Question, 447-8, 459-62, 466, 476
 Edgar the Peaceful, 24; the Atheling, 30, 36, 69
 Edgehill, battle in Oxfordshire, 269, 277 (map)
 Edinburgh, 133 (map), 228, 262, 286, 368
 Edmund Ironside, 27, of Lancaster, 105, 111, 122, 128, 142, 175 (pedigree)
 Edward the Confessor, 29-38, the Elder, 23, 127
 Edwin of Mercia, 30, 35
 Egypt, 413-4, 418, 469-70 (map), 478

- Elba, 436
 Eleanor of Aquitaine, 79, 86; of Castile, 116, 156, of Provence, 103
 Electors, Germany, 202, 249, 337, 366, 440
 Eliot, Sir John, 256-8
 Elhott, General, 398
 Elizabeth of Bohemia, 249, 337
 Ely, 25, 35, 37 (map), 59, 106 (illustr)
 Emma of Normandy, 27-8
 Engagement, 282
 Enniskillen, in Ireland, 327, 329 (map)
 Entente Cordiale, 460, 478
 Erming Street, 5 (map), 9-10 (illustr)
 Essen, 14, 25; Earls of, 241-2, 269-75
 Ethandun, battle in Wilts, 21 (illustr)
 Ethelfleda of Mercia, 23
 Ethelred the Unready, 26-8
 Eugene, Prince of Savoy, 342, 344, 346, 422
 Eustace of Boulogne, 39, 52, 76
 Evesham, battle on Avon, 37 (map), 110
 Exchequer Court, 74
 Exclusion Bill, 313, 317
 Explorations, 197, 213, 232
 Factory Acts, 456
 Fairfax, Sir Thomas, 271-8, 282, 286, 296
 Falaise, treaty in Normandy, 37 (map), 85, 127
 Falkirk, battles in Scotland, 132-3 (map), 368
 Falstaff (Shakespeare), 176
 Family Compact, 365, 380, 384, 394
 Fastolf, John, commander, 181-2
 Ferdinand of Aragon, 196, 202, of Brunswick, 376, 381
 Ferrol, Spanish port, 421, 431 (map)
 Feudalism, 26, 51-6, 63, 80, 97, 121, 150, 155
 Feversham, Lord, 319
 Fifteen, rising of the, 357-8
 Finance, 288, 291, 305, 332, 351, 360, 370, 388-9, 403, 440, 479
 Fire of London, 244, 305
 First of June, battle, 411
 Fisher, Bishop, 207
 Five Members, attempted arrest of, 265
 Five Mile Act, 299
 Flambar, Ralph, 65, 69
 Flanders, 31, 39, 90, 95-6, 130-2, 153, 183, 231, 302, 347 (map); see Netherlands
 Flint, castle in N Wales, 123, 172
 Flodden, battle in Northumberland, 133 (map), 199
 Fontenoy, battle in Flanders, 347 (map), 366
 Forests and forest laws, 48, 81, 131
 Fort Wilham, Bengal, 335; Scotland, 326
 "Forty-five," rising of the, 367-9
 Fotheringay, castle in Northants, 235, 277 (map)
 Fountains Abbey, 73 (illustr.), 133 (map), 208
 Fowey, port in Cornwall, 37 (map), 141, 159 (illustr.), 232, 275, 277 (map)
 Fox, Henry, 364, 384; Charles James, 395, 402, 404, 408, 423-4
 France, 163 (map), see under Charles, Francis, Louis, Napoleon, Philip Francis I of France, 203; II, 227; of Anjou, 234
 Frasers, clan, 369
 Frederick, Elector Palatine, 249, 259, the Great, 366, 370, 374, 381, 384; Prince of Wales, 364, 383; of York, 411, 450
 Free Companies, 162, 164
 Free Trade, 343, 403, 445-6, 456-7, 478-9
 French Revolution, 406-8, 451, 458
 Friars, 114, 166
 Froissart, chronicler, 150, 160
 Fyrd, shire levies, 18, 23, 54, 85-6, 121; see Militia
 Galway, Lord, general, 345-6
 Gardiner, Bishop, 220, 223
 Gaibaldi, Italian patriot, 459
 Gascony (Aquitaine), 79, 94, 108, 123, 127-8, 130, 141, 153-5, 162-3 (map), 183
 Gaveston, Piers, 142
 Geoffrey of Anjou, 71, 78-9, son of Henry II, 94; of Mandeville, 77

- Gerald de Barri, chronicler, 84
 Gerberoi, battle in Normandy, 36
 Germane, Lord George, 392, 396
 Germany, 200, 211-2, 249, 262, 332, 343, 356, 366, 374-5, 415, 424-8 (map), 434, 440, 464-5, 478
 Ghent, city in Flanders, 153, 163 (map), 167, 231, 347, 349 (map), 436
 Gibraltar, 345, 353, 358, 376, 395, 398
 Gladstone, prime minister, 466, 468, 470-2
 Glamorgan, marches of Wales, 65, 77, 105, 147
 Glencoe, massacre in Scotland, 323, 326
 Gloucester, 9, 110, 268, 271, 277 (map); Eails of, 65, 77, 105, 110, 121, 125, 146; Dukes of, 183, 191
 Godolphin, Lord, statesman, 325, 334, 341, 348, 350
 Godwin, Earl, 28-30
 Gordon, General, 470-1; Lord George, 398
 Grafton, Duke of, 386-7
 Grand Remonstrance, 266
 Grattan, Irish patriot, 400-1
 Gravelines, Flanders, 237, 347 (map)
 Gray's 'Elegy,' 382
 Gilece, Kingdom of, 447-8
 Grenville, George, 384-5; Lord, 423
 Grey, Lord, prime minister, 451-4
 Grosstete, Bishop, 104, 114
 Grouchy, French marshal, 437-9
 Guadeloupe, W. Indies, 373, 380, 384, 397 (map)
 Guiana, British, S. America, 418, 440
 Guises, French family, 224, 227-8
 Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, 261, 342
 Guthrum, Danish king, 21-2
 Habeas Corpus Act, 313
 Hadrian's Wall, 5-6 (map)
 Halidon Hill, battle near Berwick, 133 (map), 136, 151-2
 Halifax, Lord, 313
 Hampden, John, 260, 263, 266, 270-1
 Hampton Court, 201 (illustr.), 204, 246, 338
 Hanover, 337, 343, 356, 366, 375-6, 440, 455
 Hapsburgs, 301 (pedigree), see under Charles of Austria, Philip of Spain, etc.
 Harcla, Andrew, 147
 Harding, Stephen, Abbot, 71
 Hardinge, Lord, governor-general, 458
 Harfleur, siege in Normandy, 163 (map), 177
 Harlech, castle in Wales, 37 (map), 124, 128, 138
 Harley, Lord, 351, 354, 357, 362
 Harold, 29-34, 38
 Harold Hardrada of Norway, 31
 Harrison, General, 290
 Hastings, battle, 32-4, 139, 141
 Hastings, Warren, governor general, 396, 400-1, 404-5; Marquis of, governor-general, 401
 Havana, W. Indies, 380, 384
 Havelock, Henry, General, 463
 Hawke, Admiral, 369, 376
 Hawkins, John, 232, 235, 241
 Heads of the Proposals, 281
 Henri IV, of Navarre and France, 230, 241, 254, 302
 Henriette Marie, Queen, 254, 262, 301, 310; daughter, 301, 310
 Hereford, Earls of, 36, 125, 130, 146-7, 172
 Heretico Comburendo, Act, 174
 Hereward, 35, 54
 Herse, 152, 157
 Hides, 17, 19, 27, 38-42
 Highlanders, 278, 367-9
 Hildebrand, Pope Gregory, 66, 95
 Hittin, battle in Palestine, 87, 469 (map)
 Hohenlinden, battle in Bavaria, 344 (map), 415, 425 (map)
 Holkar, Maharajah, 416
 Holland; Elizabeth, 230-1, James I, 248-50; Charles I, 260-1; Rump, 288-9, Charles II, 303, 309-11, William III and Anne, 323, 343-53 (map), George III, 394, 411-2, 415, 434, 440

- Holmby House, in Northants, 277
(map), 280
Holy Alliance, 440, 446
Home Rule, 468, 472
Hood, Admiral, 395-8
Hopton, Ralph, cavalier, 271
Hotspur, Harry Percy, 174
Housecarls, 28, 30, 32-4
Howards, 199, 211, 236, 241
Howe, Admiral, 395, 398, 411-2;
General, 390-4
Hudson Bay, America, 353, 361; river, 377, 392-3 (map)
Huguenots, 221, 228, 230, 241,
255, 312, 321
Hull, 141, 268, 271, 277 (map)
Hungary, 342, 366, 459
Huskisson, William, reformer, 442,
445-6
Hyder Ali of Mysore, 394, 396, 400
Hyde, Sir Edward, 265, 299-308;
see Clarendon

Icem, 6
Impeachment, 165, 253, 264, 308, 312, 357, 404
Impey, Elijah, 401
Impositions, 252
Independents, 226, 265, 272, 279-83, 291, 299
India Bills, 388, 401-2, 403
Indies, East, 197, 213, James I,
249-50; Charles I, 261; Charles II,
300, George II, 369-70, 372,
380-1; George III, 384, 400-1,
415-7 (map), Victoria, 458, 462-4
(map), 468; West, 197, 213;
Elizabeth, 232; James I, 251,
Cromwell, 292; George III, 380,
384, 396-8 (map), 411, 417, 421,
440
Innocent III, Pope, 95, 114
Instrument of Government, 290
Intercourse, commercial treaty, 196
Investitures, 66, 71
Ipswich, 168, 202
Ireland, 16, 84; Tudors, 215, 242;
Stuarts, 251, 262, 265, 273,
282-5, William III, 327-9 (map);
George III, 399-400, 412-3;
Victoria, 457, 468, 472
Ireton, General, 281-2, 285, 287

Italy, 90, 126, 155, 203, 346,
410-1, 415, 424-5 (map), 440,
458, 464-5, 472

Jacobites, 326, 334-5, 354, 357,
368, 385
Jafia, 89, 469 (map)
Jamaica, 292, 294, 335, 365, 398
James IV of Scotland, 197, 199;
V, 212, son of James II, 322,
337, 357-9
Jane Grey, 217, 220, 223; Seymour, 211, 217-8
Japan, 476
Jeffreys, Judge, 314, 319
Jena, battle in Germany, 424-5 (map)
Jenkins, 365
Jerusalem, 67, 86-90
Jervis, Admiral, Lord St Vincent, 377, 411-2, 420
Jesuits, 222, 233
Jews, 60, 81, 126
Joan of Arc, 182
John, Duke of Bedford, 181-3; of Gaunt, 111, 164-5, 170, 188,
192, 235; of France, 162
Johnson, Samuel, 359
Joseph Bonaparte, 424, 428, 434-5
Joyce, Cornet, 281
Judges, 74, 82, 260, 319, 337
Junius, anonymous writer, 387
Jung, French general, 428-9
Jury trial, 82
Jutes, 14

Kenilworth, 110, 244, 288
Kent, 14, 25, 36, 170, 185, 223
Killiecrankie, battle in Scotland,
326
King's Friends, 385, 388, 402
Kitchener, Lord, 470, 472-4
Knight Service, 52-3, 69, 80, 96,
121; see Feudalism
Knights of the Shire, 109, 129
Knights of St John and Templars,
67, 89, 90, 148, 413
Knox, John, 228, 246

Labourers, Statute of, 160, 170
La Hogue, battle off France, 163
(map), 330
Lake, Lord, 413, 416

- Lake Champlain, America, 377, 392-3 (map), 436
 Lally, French general, 380-1
 Lambert, General, 287, 295-6, 298
 Lancashire, 456, 465
 Lancaster, House of, 175; see Edmund, John of Gaunt, Thomas Land Tax, 333, 351
 Lanfranc, Archbishop, 58, 62-3
 Langside, battle in Scotland, 133 (map), 229
 Langton, Archbishop, 95-6, 101
 Laswaree, battle in India, 416-7 (map)
 Latimer, Bishop, 223
 Laud, Archbishop, 260, 264
 Lauderdale, Lord, 310, 314
 Lawrence, Major, 372
 Leake, Admiral, 327, 315
 Leicester, 5 (map), 20, 82, Earls, 107, 111, 175, 228, 234, 244
 Leipzig, battle in Saxony, 425 (map), 435
 Lenthall, Speaker, 266, 290
 Leofric of Mercia, 29, 30
 Leopold of Austria, 91, King of Belgians, 454
 Lepanto, battle off Greece, 236
 Leslie, Alexander and David, 262, 274, 278, 285-6
 Levellers, 281
 Lewes, battle in Sussex, 37 (map), 109
 Leyden, in Holland, 231, 347 (map)
 Liberals, 465 onwards
 Ligny, battle in Netherlands, 437
 Lille, in Flanders, 302, 347 (map), 349
 Limerick, siege in Ireland, 328-9 (map)
 Lincoln, 8-10, 19, 59, 101, 104, 113 (illustr.), 115, 272; Earldom of, 142, 175
 Lisbon, 213, 240, 343, 411, 429
 Liveries and badges, 290, 193-4
 Liverpool, 446, Lord, 433, 441, 447
 Llewelyn the Great, 99-100; the Last, 105, 109-10, 121-3
 Loch Leven, castle in Scotland, 133 (map), 229
 Lollards, 164-6, 174, 276
 London; Roman, 6, 9-10, Saxon, 22, 35, Plantagenet, 108, 110, 185, 191; Stuart, 266, 268, 271-2, 279, 296-7, 305, 331-2 (plan), 385-7, 399 (illustr.), 442, 452, 459
 Londonderry, 252, 327, 329 (map)
 Lords, House of, 117, 147, 153-5, 165, 253, 325, 353, 402, 452-3, 472
 Lords Appellant, 171; Ordainers, 142
 Lostwithiel, battle in Cornwall, 275, 277 (map)
 Louis XIII of France, 254, 292; XIV, 242, 292-3, 302-3, 310-2, 317, 321, 325, 330-7, 342, 358, 426; XV, 358, 394, XVI, 394, 407-10; XVIII, 436, 440, Prince, 100-1
 Louisburg, fortress in America, 369-70, 377-8
 Louvois, French minister, 302
 Lucknow, 463-4 (map)
 Luther, Martin, 200, 205, 207
 Lutzen, battle in Saxony, 261
 Lyme Regis, in Dorset, 277 (map), 318
 Macadam, road engineer, 443
 Macaulay, quoted, 93, 258, 335, 340, 345, 362, 401, 451
 Macdonalds, clan, 326, 367
 Machinery, 403, 426-7, 478
 Mackay, Scottish general, 326
 Madras, 261, 370, 396
 Madrud, 345, 348, 352, 430, 434
 Mahrattas, 401, 415-6
 Maida, battle in S Italy, 424
 Malaga, battle off Spain, 345, 431 (map)
 Malcolm of Scotland, 36, 65
 Malplaquet, battle in Netherlands, 347 (map), 350-1
 Malta, 413-4, 419, 440, 466
 Manchester, 441, 456, Earl of, 274-5
 Manila, E. Indies, 380, 384
 Manor, 39-43, 47, 51, 82
 Mantes, in France, 37 (map), 60
 Marches of Wales and Lords Marchers, Normans, 65; Plantagenets, 84, 100, 110, 122, 125, 132, 143, Henry VIII, 213-4

- Marengo, battle in N. Italy, 415,
 425 (map)
 Margaret of Anjou, 185, 190,
 Beaufort, 192, 196; Tudor, 197,
 217; of Scotland, 36, 69
 Maria Theresa, Empress, 360, 370, 374
 Marlborough (Churchill), 318-9,
 321, 328-30, 334-5, 339-52,
 357, 369, 383, 422
 Marshal, William the, 86, 100-3, 130
 Marshalship, 130, 135, 199
 Marston Moor, battle in Yorks,
 274-5, 277 (map)
 Martial Law, 256, 324
 Martinique, W Indies, 373, 380,
 384, 397-8 (map)
 Mary of Burgundy, 202; of Guise,
 213, 227-8, of Modena, 317, 320;
 Stuart, 213, 217, 227-35, Tudor,
 217
 Maryland, colony, 262, 288, 393
 (map)
 Masham, Lady, 339, 351, 353-4
 Massachusetts, colony, 261, 388-91,
 393 (map)
 Massena, French marshal, 434
 Maud or Matilda, wife of Henry I,
 69, Empress, 70-1, 75-8, Queen,
 75-7
 Mauritius, 370, 440
 Mazarin, French cardinal, 292-3, 302
 Mediterranean, 260, 292, 300, 330,
 345-8, 354, 411-4, 421-3, 447
 Medway, naval disaster, 305-6
 Melbourne, Lord, prime minister,
 454, 456
 Mercia, 14-6, 21-3, 28-30, 51
 Methuen, treaty with Portugal, 343
 Militia, 212, 235, 263, 265, 269,
 280, 287, 389, 392, 420
 Milton, poet, 279, 315-6
 Minden, battle in Hanover, 376,
 425 (map)
 Minorca, 348, 353, 358, 374, 384,
 398, 415, 419
 Mirabeau, French statesman, 409
 Mogul Empire, 250, 372
 Mohammedans, 66, 87-90, 114,
 196, 236, 259-60, 292, 372, 462
 Monasteries, 58, 71-4, 166, 200,
 202, 207-9, 224
 Monk, George, 269, 274, 287, 289,
 291, 295, 303, 305, 308
 Monmouth, Duke of, 313, 318,
 320, march land, 111, 175
 Monopolies, 243, 252
 Mons, border fortress, 332, 347
 (map), 350
 Montcalm, French general, 374,
 377-8
 Montfort, Simon de, father, 96;
 son, 93, 105-11, 116-7, 121, 214
 Montgomery, 37 (map), 63, 69-70
 Montrose, James Graham, 278, 285,
 326, 368
 Moore, Sir John, 418, 429-30
 Morcar, 30-2, 35
 More, Sir Thomas, 207
 Mortimers, 110, 148, 151, 172, 177,
 185, 187, see House of York
 Mortmain, Statute of, 121
 Morton, Cardinal, 193
 Moscow, French disaster, 434
 Mutiny Act, 324, at Spithead and the Nore, 411-2, in India, 462-4
 Mysore, S India, 394-6, 401, 415-7
 Namur, border fortress, 332, 347 (map)
 Nantes, Edict of, 241, 254, 293,
 312, 317
 Napier, Sir Charles, general, 458
 Naples, Kingdom of, 359
 Napoleon, 342, 344, 408, 411-40;
 the Third, 459, 464
 Naseby, battle in Northants, 277
 (map), 278
 National Assembly, in France, 407;
 Convention, 409
 National Debt, 332, 351, 360, 370,
 383, 389, 403, 440
 Navarette, battle in N. Spain, 164,
 431 (map)
 Navarino, naval battle, 448 (illustr.)
 Navigation Acts, 288, 303, 335,
 385, 445
 Navy, Alfred, 23; Plantagenets,
 140-1, 156, Henry VIII, 210,
 217, Elizabeth, 235-7, James I,
 248, Charles I, 259-60; Commonwealth, 288-9, 294; Charles
 II, 307; Louis XIV, 302, 330;
 George II, 376-8, George III,
 394-5, 398, 411-2, 420-3

- Nelson, 236, 377, 411-4, 419-23
 Netherlands; Burgundian, 183,
 196, Spanish, 230-1, 302-3,
 330-2, 346-9 (map), Austrian,
 353, 366, 369, 409, 440, 454;
see Flanders and Holland
 Neville, pedigree, 188, see Warwick
 Neville's Cross, battle in Durham,
 133 (map), 158
 New England, colonies, 251, 261, 388
 New Model Army, 276 onwards
 New Monarchy, 190, 194
 New Orleans, battle in United States, 436
 New York, colony, 300, 302, 305,
 377, 391-6 (map)
 Newark, castle in Notts, 100, 277
 (map), 278
 Newbury, battles in Berks, 271,
 275, 277 (map)
 Newcastle, 65, 444; Marquis of,
 271, 274; Duke of, 365, 373,
 384
 Newfoundland, colony, 213, 353
 Newton, Sir Isaac, master of mint, 333
 Newtown Butler, battle in Ireland,
 327
 Ney, French marshal, 430, 437-9
 Nile, battle, 413 (plan)
 Nonconformists, 299-300, 311, 320,
 325, 354, 449
 Nootka Sound, British Columbia,
 409
 Norfolk, Earls of, 36, 123, 130, 199,
 231, county, 14, 195
 Norham, castle, 127, 133 (map), 146
 Normandy and Normans, 22, 27,
 29 onwards, 70, 77, 79, 92, 94-7,
 108, 155, 177-8, 183
 North, Lord, 388, 401-2
 Northallerton, battle in Yorks, 77,
 133 (map)
 Northampton, treaty, 150
 Northumberland, Earl of, 174,
 Duke of, 220-1, 223
 Northumbria, kingdom, 14-6, 25,
 28, 30, 32, 38, 51
 Norwich, 168
 Nottingham, 20, 122, 267
 Nova Scotia, colony, 353, 466
 Oates, Titus, 312, 317
 Occasional Conformity Act, 354
 O'Connell, Daniel, 449
 Odo of Bayeux, 34, 36, 63
 Ohio, fight for the, 373, 377, 393
 (map)
 Oldcastle, Sir John, 176
 O'Neills, 251, 284
 Oporto, battle, 430-1 (map)
 Orange, William I, 230-1, 234,
 Maurice and Frederick, 249,
 William II, 289; III, 303, 311,
 313, 320; pedigree, 301
 Ordeal, 18, 50, 82
 Order of the Bath, 188; the Garter,
 149, 160; Golden Fleece, 191
 Orders in Council, 427
 Orleans, 163 (map), 181; Dukes of,
 301 (pedigree), 310, 353, 451
 Ormonde, Marquis of, 284; Duke of, 353-4, 357
 Ostend, port of Flanders, 346-7
 (map)
 Owen Glendower, 174
 Oxford, 77, 111-4, 165, 167, 186,
 200, 207, 268, 271, 313, 320, 371,
 Earls of, 194, 354, 357; see Harley;
 Provisions of, 107, 109
 Palatine counties, 51, 70, 111, 118
 Palmerston, Lord, prime minister,
 454, 459-60, 464-5
 Panama, isthmus, 233, 335, 354,
 365
 Papacy, early times, 16; Norman reigns, 58, 66, 71; Plantagenets,
 95-6, 100-1, 103-4, 108, 130,
 134, 161, 171; Tudors, 198,
 200, 203-5, 222-3, 226, 230,
 240, Stuarts, 247, 317-20, 427,
 440
 Parliament, Plantagenet reigns, 99,
 107, 109, 117-8, 129, 142, 147-8,
 153, 165, 170-1, 173, 192;
 Tudors, 193, 205, 217, 242;
 Stuarts, 252-3, 255-8, 263 onwards, 297-9, 312-3, 322, 324;
see Commons, Lords, Boroughs, Reform
 Paris, 22, 181, 183, 228, 241,
 407-8, 451, 464; treaties of, 108,
 384, 462

- Parma, Alexander of, 231, 234-5, 241
 Partition Treaty, 336
 Party Government, 324, 361, 385
 Passaro, Sicily, 359
 Patay, battle in France, 182
 Pavia, battle in N. Italy, 203, 425
 (map)
 Peasants' Revolts, 170, 183, 185,
 188, 220; Jacquerie in France, 162
 Pecquigny, treaty in N. France, 191
 Peel, Sir Robert, prime minister,
 442, 449, 457
 Pelham, Henry, financier, 361, 365,
 370, 373
 Pembroke, 65, 84, 101, 104, see
 William the Marshal
 Penal Code, 328, 400
 Peninsular War, 428-35 (map)
 Penn, father, 292, son, 302
 Pennsylvania, colony, 302, 393 (map)
 Pepys, Samuel, diarist, 305, 308
 Perceval, Spencer, prime minister, 432-3
 Peterborough, 39, 53, 59, Earl of,
 345-6
 Petition of Right, 100, 256
 Philadelphia, 389, 391-4 (map)
 Philip I of France, 36, 60; II, 87,
 94, IV, 127, 134; VI, 153,
 157-8, II of Spain, 202, 223,
 227 onwards, 301 (pedigree);
 V, 336-7, 350, 353, 358-9
 Philiphaugh, battle in Scotland,
 133 (map), 277-8
 Philippa, Queen, 150, 160
 Pierre des Roches, Bishop, 103
 Pilgrimage of Grace, 209, 215
 Pinkie, battle in Scotland, 133
 (map), 218
 Pitt, the elder, 341, 364, 371,
 375-86, 394, 410; the younger,
 402-4, 409-13, 421-3
 Plague, 160, 305
 Plassey, battle in India, 380, 400,
 417 (map)
 Plots, Babington, 235, Gunpowder,
 248, Popish, 312-3, Ridolfi, 231;
 Rye House, 315
 Plymouth, 141, 236, 239, 251, 271, 376
 Poitiers, battle in France, 161, 163
 (map)
 Poitou, in France, 79, 94, 97, 108,
 163 (map)
 Poland, 312, 411, 426, 440, 454
 Pole, Cardinal, 223
 Pollock, General, 458
 Pondicherry, in India, 369, 381,
 384, 417 (map)
 Ponthieu, in France, 69, 156, 163
 (map)
 Poona, in India, 416-7 (map)
 Poor Laws, 216, 243, 453
 Porto Bello, Panama, 365
 Porto Novo, India, 380, 417 (map)
 Portsmouth, 155, 257, 412
 Portugal, 197, 213, 236, 240,
 249-50, 300, 343, 428 onwards,
 446
 Poynings' Act, 215, 399
 Praemunire, Statute of, 161, 204-5
 Pragmatic Sanction, 366
 Prayer Book, 219, 225, 262
 Prerogative of the Crown, 119,
 252-6, 311, 319, 324
 Presbyterians, 221, 226, 228, 246,
 265, 272, 279, 285-6, 291, 295,
 314, 326, 349
 Preston, Lancashire, 277 (map),
 282, 368, Middlesex, 244
 Preston Pans, battle in Scotland,
 133 (map), 368
 Pride's Purge, 283, 296
 Prime Minister, 361, 365
 Prince Regent, 441
 Privilege of Parliament, 252-3, 387
 Provisors, Statute of, 161
 Prussia, 172, 343, 366, 381, 409-11,
 424, 434-40, 464
 Public Opinion, 189, 193, 317, 322,
 356, 387
 Puritans, 221, 261-2, 388, and see
 Independents and Presbyterians
 Pym, John, 263-6, 272
 Quatre Bras, battle in Netherlands,
 437
 Quebec, 373, 378-9 (illustr.), 382,
 393 (map)
 Quiberon Bay, naval battle, 377-9,
 423, 425 (map)
 Raleigh, Sir Walter, 234, 241,
 245, 249, 251

- Ramilies, battle in Netherlands, 346-7 (map)
- Room of Parliament, 404, 409, 450-3, 455, 465
- Reformation, 199-200, 205, 221-2, 226
- Regulating Act for India, 388, 401
- Reign of Terror, 409
- Relief, feudal, 56, 63, 68, 97
- Rhineland, 409, 415, 424-6, 440
- Rhuddlan, castle in N. Wales, 37 (map), 123, 138
- Richelieu, Cardinal, 254-7, 261, 292-3, 302
- Rights of Man, 281, 406
- Riots, 358, 399, 441, 452
- Robert of Gloucester, 65, 77; of Normandy, 36, 62, 67-70
- Roberts, Lord, 325, 468, 472-4
- Rochelle, La, W. France, 164, 255-7
- Rochester, castle in Kent, 37 (map), 53 (illustr.), 63
- Rockingham, Lord, 386
- Rodney, Admiral, 395, 398, 423
- Roman Catholic disabilities, 225-6, 240, 247-8, 285, 320, 328, 399, 449
- Root and Branch Bill, 265
- Rooke, -Admiral, 343, 345
- Rouen, capital of Normandy, 78, 163 (map), 178, 182
- Rousseau, French writer, 406
- Rump Parliament, 283-90, 295
- Runnymede on Thames, 95, 98 (illustr.)
- Rupert, Prince, 269 onwards, 288, 303, 311, 337
- Russells, 209, 220, 315, 330, 334, 363, Lord John, 449-51
- Russia, 359, 375, 415, 421-8, 434, 440, 447-8, 459-62, 465, 476-8
- Ruyter, Dutch admiral, 303, 305, 311
- Rye, port in Sussex, 139-41 (illustr.); House, 315 (illustr.)
- Ryswick, treaty in Holland, 333, 347 (map)
- Sacheverell, Dr. 351
- Sackville, Lord, 376, see Germaine
- Sadowa, battle in Bohemia, 425 (map), 464
- Saladin, 86-90
- Salamanca, battle in Spain, 431-2 (map), 434-5
- Salisbury (Sarum), 3 (map), 52, 112 (illustr.), 115, 321, 364; Earls of, 97, 185, 188, 247, Marquis, 466
- Sandwich, port of Kent, 101, 139-41
- Saratoga, battle in America, 392-3 (map)
- Sardinia, 359, 440, 464
- Sarsfield, Irish general, 328
- Saunders, Admiral, 378; Governor, 372
- Savoy, 103-4, 292, 342-3, 354, 359, 409-10, 415, 424, 440, 464
- Saxe, French marshal, 366, 369
- Saxony, 375, 400, 424, 434, 440, 465
- Schelde, see Antwerp; 347 (map)
- Schiltron, Shield-wall, 132, 137, 145
- Schools, Winchester, 165, Eton, 187, Ipswich, 200-2, St Paul's, 207; Edward VI's, 219, various, 244
- Scinde, India, 401, 458, 463 (maps)
- Scone, palace near Perth, 129, 133 (map)
- Scotland, pre-Norman, 6, 16, 23; Norman reigns, 36, 65, 69, 77, 85-6, 88; Edwards, 119-20, 127-35 (map), 143-7, 150-2, 158; Tudors, 197-9, 212-3, 217-8, 227-9; Stuarts, 246-7, 252, 262-3 (see Leslies), 282-3, 285-7, 314, William III, 326, 335-6, Union, 348-9; after Union, 357-8, 367-9, 443
- Scott, Sir Walter, references to, 87-8 (Talisman), 92 (Ivanhoe), 146 and 199 (Marmion), 191 (Anne of Geierstein), 228 and 244 (Kentworth), 298 (Woodstock), 314 (Old Mortality), 326 (ballad)
- Scutage, shield-money, 80, 97
- Sebastopol, siege, 460-2
- Sedgemoor, battle in Somerset, 277 (map), 318-9 (illustr.)
- Self-denying Ordinance, 275
- Septennial Act, 358
- Seringapatam, siege in S. India, 416-7 (map)

- Settlement, Act of, 337
 Seven Years' War, 374-84
 Shaftesbury, Ashley Cowper, 310-1, 313-5
 Shakespeare, references to, 176, 180 (Henry V), 200 (Henry VIII), 245 (John), 251 (Tempest)
 Sharpe, Archbishop, 314
 Sherifffmuir, battle in Scotland, 358
 Ship Money, 259-60, 264, 292
 Shires and Sheriffs, 24-6, 36, 46
 Shrewsbury, 51, 69-70, 174, 215, 219
 Sicily, 354, 359, 426
 Sidney, Algernon, 315, Philip, 234, 245
 Sikhs, Punjab, 401, 458, 463 (map), 467 (illustr.)
 Silesia, Germany, 366, 370, 374, 384
 Sindia, Maharajah, 416
 Siward, Earl, 29
 Six Acts, 441; Six Articles, 211, 219
 Slavery, 233, 354, 404, 409, 424, 453, 465
 Sluys, battle off Flanders, 155, 163 (map)
 Smith, Adam, 403; Harry, 458, John, 251; Sydney, 414
 Smuggling, 364-5, 399, 403
 Solway Moss, battle in Scotland, 133 (map), 212
 Somers, Lord, 336, 348
 Somerset, Lord Protector, 218-20
 Sophia, Electress, 337
 Soult, French marshal, 430-4
 S. American Republics, 427, 446
 South Sea Company, 359-60
 Spain, Black Prince in, 164; Henry VII and VIII, 196-7, 202-3 (pedigree), 212-3; Mary, 222-3; Elizabeth, 230-41; Stuarts, 247-8, 253-5, 292-3, 301-3 (pedigree); William, 335-7, Anne, 342-53, Georges, 358-9, 364-5, 380, 384, 394-5, 409, 411, 419-23, 426-35 (map), 446
 Speaker, of Commons, 165, 257, 266, 290
 Stamford, Lincs, 5 (map), 19, 141; Bridge, Yorks, 5 (map), 32
 Stamp Act, 385-6
 Stanhope, General, 348, 359
 Star Chamber, 194, 215, 200, 264
 Statutes, 117, 120-1, 160-1, 205-6, see Praemunire, Winchester, etc.
 St Albans, 5 (map), 6, 11, 37 (map), 53, 57, 141, 171, 185
 St Bartholomew, massacre, 230
 St Brice, massacre, 27
 St Helena, 440
 St John, see Bolingbroke
 St Lucia, W. Indies, 380, 384, 396-8 (map), 440
 St Vincent, Portugal, battle off, 376, 411, 431 (map); see Jervis Steam, 403, 426-7, 444
 Steele, Richard, 352, 355
 Stephenson, Robert, engineer
 Stevenson, Robert, light-builder, 444
 Stigand, Archbishop, 29, 3
 Stirling, 131-4 (map), (illustr.), 286, 368
 Strafford, Thomas Wen. 256-8, 262, 264-5
 Strongbow, Richard of Clare, 101, 136
 Succession, Act of, 207
 Supremacy, Acts of, 205, 27
 Suraj, Dowlah, 380
 Surat, factory in India, 25, 417 (map)
 Surrey, Earls of, 120, 199
 Sussex, kingdom, 14, 25
 Sweden, 261-2, 309, 341, 359, 426
 Swift, Dean, 341, 352, 354
 Swiss, 137, 191, 221, 292, 415
 Talavera, battle in Spain, 430-1 (map)
 Talbot, Lord, 182
 Tangier, N. Africa, 300, 354
 Taunton, Somerset, 268, 277 (map), 318
 Taxation; see Danegeld, Aids, Scutage, Plantagenet reigns, 117, 120, 129, 148, 190, 243; Stuarts and Commonwealth, 256, 268, 288, 291, 305; William III onwards, 324, 333, 351, 385, 412, 441

- Tea duties, 366-8
 Tel el-Kebir, battle in Egypt, 469-70 (map)
 Telford, engineer, 443, 446
 Temple, Sir William, statesman, 309
 Test Act, 311, 317-21, 325, 449
 Tewkesbury, abbey, 59 (illustr.); battle, 190
 Thackeray, references to, 244 (New-comers), 341 and 350 (Edmond)
 Thegn, 26, 31, 36
 Theobald, Archbishop, 78, 80
 Theodore of Tarsus, 16
 Thirty Years' War, 249, 254, 261
 Thomas of Lancaster, 142-3, 147, 175 (pedigree)
 Ticonderoga, battle in America, 377, 393 (map)
 Tilbury, fort in Essex, 239, 277 (map) treaty in E. Prussia, 424-6
 Trafalgar, battle in Normandy, 375 (map), 70, 135
 Rockingham, abbey, 37 (map), 72
 Rodney, 1, 208
 Roman Sahib of Mysore, 414-6
 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000
 To. Earl, 30, 32
 Toulon, French port, 345-8, 376, 411, 421, 425 (map)
 Toulouse, battle in S. France, 435
 Tournai, border fortress, 347 (map), 350, 366
 Townshend, Lord, agriculturist, 359, 361-3; Charles, Chancellor of Exchequer, 386-7
 Towton, battle in Yorks, 185, 277 (map)
 Trafalgar, battle, 375, 422, 431 (map)
 Trichinopoly, siege in S. India, 372, 417 (map)
 Triclinial Acts, Charles I, 263; William III, 333, 350, 358
 Trinidad, W. Indies, 397 (map), 418-9, 440
 Triple Alliance, Charles II, 309; Victoria, 472
 Troyes, treaty, in France, 163 (map), 179, 181
 Tudors, 192, 217 (pedigree)
 Turenne, French marshal, 293, 302, 311, 339
 Turks, 87, 236, 312, 413-4, 447-8, 459, 466
 Tyler, Wat, 170, 185, 188, 452
 Ulm, in Bavaria, 344 (plan), 422, 425 (map)
 Uniformity, Acts of, Elizabeth, 225, Charles II, 299
 Union with Scotland, 348-9, with Ireland, 413
 United States, 435-6, 465, 479
 Utrecht, treaty, in Holland, 347 (map), 353, 358-9
 Valence, William of, 104
 Valley Forge, in America, 392-3 (map)
 Vane, Sir Harry, statesman, 272, 289, 298
 Vauban, French marshal, 302, 332, 335
 Venice, trade centre, 90, 126, 213, 236, 249, 259, 425 (map), 440
 Verneuil, battle in France, 163 (map), 181
 Versailles, treaty, 398; French Revolution, 407-8; 464
 Victor Emanuel, King of Italy, 462, 464-5
 Vienna, 312, 343, 423, 432, 436
 Villars, French marshal, 343, 350, 353
 Villenage, 39-47, 82, 160, 170, 188
 Villeneuve, French admiral, 421-2
 Vimiero, battle in Portugal, 429, 431 (map)
 Vinegar Hill, in Ireland, 329 (map), 413
 Virginia, colony, 234, 251, 262, 373, 388, 393 (map), 396
 Vittoria, battle in Spain, 431 (map), 434
 Voltaire, French writer, 374, 406

- Wagram, battle in Austria, 425 (map), 432
- Wakefield, battle in Yorks, 185, 277 (map)
- Walcheien Island, in Holland, 425 (map), 432
- Wales, 37 (map), 119-20, 121-5, 128, 174, 213-4, 271, 282
- Wallace, William, 120, 131-5
- Wallingford, on Thames, 35, 37 (map), 78
- Walpole, Sir Robert, prime minister, 357-66
- Walsingham, Francis, statesman, 235
- Waltheof, Earl, 30, 36
- Wandewash, battle in India, 381, 396, 417 (map)
- Warbeck, Perkin, imposter, 193
- Wardship, feudal, 56, 63, 97
- Warwick, Earls of, 185-90, 220
- Washington, George, 373, 390-2, 396; city, 436
- Waterloo, 347 (map), 438-9
- Watling Street, 5 (map), 9, 22
- Watt, James, inventor, 403
- Webb, General, 350
- Wellesley, Marquis, 401, 415-6, Arthur, see Wellington
- Wellington, 416, 426, 429-39, 447-9, 452-3
- Wentworth, see Strafford
- Wesley, John and Charles, 371
- Wessex, kingdom, 14-6, 21-30
- Westminster, 29, 35, 114-5, 117, 129, 188; Statute of, 120
- Wexford, 284, 329 (map), 413
- Whigs, 313, 324, 333-4, 350, 356-7, 383-6, 397-8, 450-3, 457, 459
- Whitby, in Yorks, 5 (map), 16
- Wilberforce, William, 404
- Wilkes, John, editor, 386-7
- William Clito, 10, 75 (pedigree); the Lion, 85 German Emperor, 464, see 'O' nge
- Winchelsea, port, 13, 411; Archbishop, 130, 134
- Winchester, 5 (map), 35, 37 (map), 59, 68, 165; Statute of, 121
- Windsor, 39, 149, 188
- Witan, 26, 30, 35, 62
- Witt, Dutch statesman, 303, 305, 309-11
- Wolfe, General, 351, 377-8, 382
- Wolseley, General, 470
- Wolsey, Cardinal, 199-200, 203-4
- Wool, 71, 120, 131, 158, 168, 195-6, 207, 215
- Worcester, battle, 277 (map), 286-7, 297
- Wycliffe, reformer, 164-6, 171
- Wykeham, Bishop, 165
- Wynendael, battle in Flanders, 350
- York, 5 (map), 9-11, 32, 117, 146-7, 274, House of, 177, 185, 187 (pedigree), 214, Dukes of, James, 300, 303, 311, 313; Frederick, 411, 450
- Yorkshire, 35, 48, 71, 271-4
- Yorktown, siege in America, 395 (map), 396
- Zulu War, 470-1 (map)
- Zutphen, battle in Holland, 234

SELECT HISTORICAL WORKS

(Arranged in alphabetical order of authors' names)

Stories of Exploration and Discovery. By A. B. ARCHER, LL.D. Crown 8vo. With 21 maps and illustrations. 2s. 6d. net

The English Puritans. By JOHN BROWN, D.D. Cloth, 3s. net. Leather, 2s. 6d. net

History of Scotland to the Present Time. By P. HUME BROWN, M.A., LL.D., F.B.A. In three volumes Royal 8vo. With 132 full-page plates and 11 maps. Half morocco, gilt top, 50s. net, cloth, 30s. net. Separate volumes as follows in cloth, 10s. 6d. net each
[For smaller edition see p. 3]

Count St Paul's Journal of the Seven Years' War. Edited by GEORGE GREY BUTLER, M.A. Royal 8vo. With 2 portraits and 65 maps and plans. 63s. net

The Growth of English Industry and Commerce during the Early and Middle Ages. By W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D., Fellow of the British Academy, Hon. Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, and Fellow of Trinity College, Archdeacon of Ely. Demy 8vo. Fifth edition 12s. 6d. net

The Growth of English Industry and Commerce in Modern Times. By the Ven. W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D., F.B.A., etc. Fourth edition revised Demy 8vo. Two parts. (1) The Mercantile System 10s. net. (2) Laissez Faire. 7s. 6d. net

The Industrial Revolution. By the Ven. W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D., F.B.A., etc. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

The Life of Thomas Pitt. By Sir CORNELIUS NEALE DALTON, K.C.M.G., C.B. Demy 8vo. With 8 illustrations. 15s. net.

Wales and the Wars of the Roses. By H. T. EVANS, M.A. Demy 8vo. With 3 maps. 10s. net.

Military History. By the Hon. J. W. FORTESCUE. Cloth, 1s. 3d. net. Leather, 2s. 6d. net

History of the Life and Reign of Richard III., to which is added the Story of Perkin Warbeck from original documents. By JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B., LL.D. New and enlarged edition Crown 8vo. With two portraits. 8s. 6d.

China and the Manchus. By Prof. H. A. GILES, LL.D. Cloth, 1s. 3d. net. Leather, 2s. 6d. net.

Annals of Politics and Culture, 1492—1899. By G. P. GOOCH, M.A. With an Introductory Note by Lord Acton. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Select Historical Works

Lectures on the History of the Nineteenth Century, delivered at the Cambridge University Extension Summer Meeting, August, 1902. Edited by F A KIRKPATRICK, M A. Crown 8vo.
4s 6d net.

The Evolution of New Japan. By Prof J H LONG-
FORD. Cloth, 1s. 3d net Leather, 2s. 6d net

Bannockburn. By JOHN E. MORRIS, D Litt. Fcap 4to
With 8 plates and 2 maps. 5s net.

The Constitutional History of England. A Course of Lectures delivered by F. W. MAITLAND, LL D. Demy 8vo 12s 6d net.

The Early History of the House of Savoy, 1000-1233.
By C W. PREVIERÉ ORTON, M.A Demy 8vo. With 2 maps.
12s 6d net.

Ancient India from the Earliest Times to the First Century
A.D By E. J. RAPSON, M A. With 6 illustrations and 2 maps.
3s net.

The Origins of the War. By J HOLLAND ROSE, Litt D
Crown 8vo. Paper covers, 1s net Cloth, 2s. 6d net

The Growth of British Policy. An Historical Essay
By Sir J R SEELEY, M A, Litt D, K C M G With a Portrait, and a Memoir of the Author by G. W PROTHERO, Litt D Second edition Crown 8vo 2 vols 12s net.

New Zealand. By Sir ROBERT and J L STOUT Cloth, 1s 3d net Leather, 2s 6d net

The Puritans in Power. By G B. TATHAM, M A, Demy 8vo 7s 6d net.

Personal and Party Government. A Chapter in the Political History of the early years of the reign of George III, 1760-1766 By D A. WINSTANLEY, M A Crown 8vo. 4s 6d net

Lord Chatham and the Whig Opposition. By D. A WINSTANLEY, M.A. Demy 8vo With frontispiece 7s 6d net

The Reign of Henry the Fifth. By J. H. WYLIE, M A., D.Litt. Royal 8vo. Vol 1 1413-15 25s net.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

C F CLAY, MANAGER

LONDON FETTER LANE, E C.

EDINBURGH. 100, PRINCES STREET

